Netanyahu vows to end extremist haredi behaviour

Says Beit Shemesh conflict a test for Israel's democracy

Jonathan Lis
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will act against anyone who harasses women in the public sphere, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week, the day after a massive protest against gender segregation took place in the central Israel town of Beit Shemesh.

On Dec. 28, thousands of Israelis gathered near the Orot girls school in Beit Shemesh to protest gender segregation in a city that has become a symbol for the struggle against religious extremism.

Referring to rising tensions over gender segregation in Israel's haredi community, Netanyahu said in the Knesset Dec. 29 that Israel will act against "anyone who harasses women, anyone who harasses people in the public sphere.

"We won't accept spitting on people in the street just because someone doesn't approve of their apparel," the prime minister said, adding that the "public sphere is open and safe and will remain so.

"This is part of what makes Israel a liberal, western democracy – that the public sphere is open and free to everyone," he said, warning, however, against an attack on the entire haredi community.

"We must beware of generalizing an entire population, because the vast majority of the haredi public combines an adherence to Jewish tradition and a complete respect of the law," Netanyahu said, commending top rabbis who criticized the actions of extremists.

He said recent clashes were instigated by "violent, lawless, fringe groups," adding that those criticizing the entire haredi community would be better off "uniting to eradicate these incidents.

"We'll stop the extremists, and won't let anyone harm Jews, Arabs, or [vandalize] mosques"

Netanyahu's comments came after a female Israel Defence Forces soldier reported being accosted by a haredi man over her refusal to move to the back of a segregated bus in Jerusalem.

Thousands of Israelis took part in a demonstration on Dec. 27 in Beit Shemesh to protest the attempt by some haredim there to exclude women from public life. The sign urges the "silent majority to awake. Israel is a free country." JVS Gets Funding

TORONTO — Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) Toronto received $280,000 from Ottawa for two work training programs. Natural Resources Minister and Eglinton-Lawrence MP Joe Oliver said Dec. 16 that JVS' Asperger's Job Readiness Program will get $182,000 from the Opportunities Fund for Persons with Disabilities to train and support 16 people with Asperger's syndrome. JVS will also get $98,000 for a youth employment project to help 10 young people train or gain experience to find work or go back to school.

Police Seek Suspect

TORONTO — Toronto Police's sex crimes unit combed the area northwest of Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue last week seeking a suspect in the abduction and sexual assault of a four-year-old girl who was visiting from Connecticut with her grandparents for Chanukah. Police said she was assaulted and then abducted from a house Dec. 26 at around 3 a.m. by a man described as white, 19 or 20, medium build, 5-6 to 5-10, wearing a blue jacket or sweatshirt and bluish toque or hat with a stripe and dark pants. Family members saw a man fleeing shortly after noticing the girl missing from her bed. She was found outside a short distance from the house.

Workers Arrested

HALIFAX — Eleven Israelis were arrested in Halifax for allegedly working illegally there. Their alleged ringleader, Iftash Jacob, was among 10 Israelis arrested Dec. 21 in a raid on a Halifax home and on kiosks at three malls in the Halifax region. Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) officials arrested an 11th person the next day outside a courthouse. Jacob was released after surrendering his passport and posting a $7,500 bond. He must report to the CBSA every week and travel from Toronto to Halifax next month to enter a plea. Eight of the accused – two women and six men – pleaded guilty to working in Canada without authorization and were each fined $1,000. They're allowed to stay in Canada but not to work. One accused was freed on bail and must abide by the same conditions as Jacob. The CBSA claims Jacob brought foreign workers to Canada illegally and was working illegally himself. Also last month, 31 people, mostly Israelis, were arrested for working illegally at Ottawa-area malls. In WikiLeaks documents released in August, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel said such schemes are a $1-billion industry. He said young Israelis are promised good pay for selling goods at mall kiosks, but many are forced to work long hours for little money, CBC reported.

Sask. Extends Funds To Private Schools

REGINA — Saskatchewan will give public funds to private schools, including faith-based ones, Education Minister Donna Harpauer announced.

Donna Harpauer

The plan, which starts next fall, will give 50 per cent of the provincial per-student public school average to a new category of "independent" non-profit schools that comply with certain criteria, such as implementing the provincial curriculum, employing certified teachers, taking part in the provincial student assessment program, and complying with education ministry directives, Postmdedia News reported.

There are more than 30 mostly faith-based independent schools in the province, but no Jewish day schools. Some areas also have provincially funded Catholic and Protestant separate schools, and there are faith-based schools associated with public boards whose funding will rise to 80 per cent of the per-student average.

The new Saskatchewan model is similar to the one in British Columbia, where 85 per cent of private schools, including some Jewish ones, get funding under conditions similar to those announced by Harpauer.

She said her government "is committed to providing a high quality education system that supports Saskatchewan's families and attracts new families."

Canada to chair Holocaust task force in 2013

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada will assume the chairmanship of the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research in 2013.

Former Davenport Liberal MP Mario Silva will chair the organization for that year. Chair countries hold the position for 12 months, during which time it hosts meetings for member states.

Mario Silva

Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, made the announcement Dec. 15. "I am proud of the leadership role that Canada is taking to further Holocaust education and combat antisemitism together with all forms of racism and xenophobia," Kenney said in a statement.

Established in 1998, the task force is composed of 31 member countries. Canada became involved with the organization in 2007 and was made a full member in 2009.

Silva has been active in Holocaust education for years. He was chair of the inquiry committee and vice-chair of the steering committee of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA).

He also helped ensure the success of the 2010 Ottawa conference of the Inter-parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA), which brought together parliamentarians and experts from around the world to "lead the fight against global antisemitism," Kenney said.

The 2010 ICCA Conference produced the Ottawa Protocol, which called for leaders of faith groups to combat all hatred and discrimination, including antisemitism, "which is inextricably linked to the universal lessons of the Holocaust," the task force's website states.

Both Kenney and Liberal MP for Mount Royal Irwin Cotler are ex-officio members of the steering committee of CPCCA.

Cotler, who has championed human rights issues throughout his career, lauded Silva's appointment.

"This is an important responsibility and Mario will be an excellent chair," Cotler wrote to The CJN in an e-mail. "Canada will be playing a major role in Holocaust remembrance, education and research during its chairmanship in 2013 and Mario will be the right person to exercise leadership on Canada's behalf."

Silva, who lost his seat in the 2011 election to NDPer Andrew Cash, said he was inspired to become involved in combating antisemitism because of his personal history as an immigrant to Canada from Portugal.

"I see myself as a minority… and I see this [appointment] as part and parcel of my work on and support of human rights around the world," Silva said. "We cannot be complacent when we have leaders like [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad spewing hatred and targeting [Israel] with destruction. We can't stand by when an ally like Israel is being made out to be the scapegoat for every problem in the world."

He said it is crucial to take on antisemitism around the world because it attempts to "dehumanize" the Jewish people and by extension "vilify" and "delegitimize" the State of Israel.

"I look forward to working with [Kenney and Cotler] to help define what Canada's objectives will be while chairing the task force," Silva told The CJN in a phone interview a day after his appointment.

He noted that both Kenney and Cotler encouraged him to accept the chair of the task force, believing him to be the best candidate for the job.

A corridor of blood

From the editor's desk...

These words were written three days before the advent of the new year. For many people in disparate countries, we observe with great melancholy, the transition from one year to the next was a falling through horror into a corridor of blood.

A partial listing of the inventory of slaughter during Christmas week is illustrative.

In Nigeria, Boko Haram, a group of Islamist militants whose ambition is to establish sharia rule throughout the country, set out on Christmas to kill as many Christians as they could. They murdered 40. The Islamists bombed three churches and set off two other blasts in the north of the country. As of this writing, Nigerian authorities were on the alert for retaliatory strikes by Christian zealots.

In Afghanistan, also on Christmas, a suicide bomber attacked a funeral procession, killing 19 people, including a member of the Afghan parliament. The city and the province in which the bombing occurred had already been handed over by NATO to Afghan forces as part of the planned withdrawal of foreign combat forces by the end of 2014.

In Iraq, some 65 people, mostly Shiite Iraqis, were killed during coordinated attacks merely days after American forces quit the country. Al Qaeda claimed responsibility.

The Sunni terrorists have an abiding, atavistic, deeply held hostility toward the Shiite majority, indeed to Shiite believers in general. They distrust the elected Iraqi government because the prime minister is a Shiite Muslim. They killed their Shiite counterparts in order to protect their co- Sunni believers.

"The mujahedeen [holy warriors] will never stand with their hands tied while the pernicious Iranian project showed its ugly face and what it wants with Sunnis in Iraq became obvious and exposed," the Al Qaeda followers proclaimed in a statement posted on jihadist forums, according to the U.S.-based SITE Intelligence Group.

And in Syria, the chief charnel house in the Middle East currently, the state-sponsored slaughter continues unabated. Arab League monitors arrived in the country last week even as government tanks were shooting at civilians in Homs. Each day, there were reports of dozens of new deaths on both sides of the battle. The toll of the intra-Syrian fighting has likely exceeded 5,000.

Many western observers greeted the arrival of the Arab League monitors with perfervid expressions of relief and gratitude. The end of the anarchy and violence was now in sight, they maintained. But their gladness of heart was more delusion than solution, more chimera than oasis.

As Zvi Bar'el pointed out in Ha'aretz, the Arab League monitors' real objective was to "prevent the Syrian crisis from reaching the United Nations. Their mission is not to prevent the killing of civilians... They are coming to observe the killing, listen to the claims of civilians and the regime and report to the league."

Jonathan Tobin of Commentary brought additional context to the arrival of the Arab League observers.

"The notion that the Arab League was going to stand up for human rights in Syria was always somewhat farcical," he wrote. "This is, after all, a group that has numbered among its members some of the worst tyrants in the world and which has supported terrorist groups so long as their targets were Jews and not Arab oligarchs... The identity of the head of that peace mission ought to pour cold water on the idea that it will do much to help alleviate human rights abuses. As David Kenner reports in Foreign Policy, the head of the mission is none other than Sudanese Gen. Mohammad Ahmed Mustafa al-Dabi. Dabi just happens to be the man who created the murderous janjaweed militias that were the principal perpetrators in the Darfur genocide."

Thus, the last two weeks of 2011 were much like the first two weeks of the year – fraught with sectarian strife and a great deal of killing, most of it Muslim of Muslim.

And as the bombs exploded and the blood spilled throughout the Middle East and parts of Africa, the UN Security Council, except for the United States, excoriated Israel for not stopping construction in and around Jerusalem. South Africa's UN Ambassador Baso Sangqu, speaking on behalf of the Nonaligned Movement of mainly developing countries, said Israeli settlement construction was "the main impediment for the two-state solution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

It is sad, increasingly tragic and potentially calamitous that the Palestinians and the Israelis have not returned to negotiations. But for the Security Council to blame Israel alone for this is an assault on truth and fact.

However, ignoring the ongoing butchery and massacre, in Syria for example, that sends blood into the streets like storms overwhelming the sewers, assaults conscience and morality. And it merely ensures that more blood will flow in Syria, or in the Middle East or Africa, where the UN feigns concern for human rights, and anywhere the Israel Defence Forces do not protect the people of Israel. – MBD

Federation says new JCC to open in 2016

$40M has to be raised before project can be started

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

More than a year after the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) was torn down, construction has yet to begin on the building that will replace it, and officials now say it won't open until 2016.

Fundraising for the new Prosserman JCC is "going very well – better than we estimated," according to Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, in an e-mail interview.

However, when asked, he did not specify how much had been raised in the past year. Last December, Howard English – at the time the federation's vice-president of corporate communications – told The CJN that the federation needed to raise approximately $40 million for the project before it could responsibly break ground.

Ted Sokolsky

The total cost of completing the Sherman Campus, located on Bathurst Street between Sheppard and Finch avenues, was estimated last year to be about $150 million in total, including about $110 million for Phase 2, which will include the new JCC, a new Koffler Centre of the Arts and Leah Posluns Theatre, and the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre.

Phase 1, which has already been completed, cost $40 million, including the $10-million Donald Gales Family Pavilion, renovations to the Lipa Green Centre and reconstruction of the parking lot.

Last year, English said the new JCC was expected to be finished by 2014, but Sokolsky is now talking about a 2016 opening.

The BJCC closed in September 2009, and the Gales Pavilion opened the following month. It houses fitness facilities and classes as part of the Prosserman JCC, the entity that will include the building replacing the BJCC.

Tearing down the old building saved the federation millions of dollars a year in repairs and operating costs, according to Sokolsky. Having it already demolished "gives us at least a six-month head start when we start construction again."

Sokolsky said there are currently about 700 paid Prosserman JCC fitness members, which is approaching 80 per cent capacity. Last year there were 620. Before the BJCC closed, it had more than 1,200 fitness members.

He said roughly 4,700 people are involved in centre programs, an increase of 15 per cent over this time last year.

Sokolsky said that plans for the new JCC have been updated, but "all the major elements remain, and the square footage doesn't change."

He added: "Our goal is to be in the ground just at the end of 2013. That could mean an opening in 2016."

He expressed disappointment that the project has been "slowed down," but added that the Lebovic campus in Vaughan is "moving ahead on time and on budget. All the growth in JCC membership over the last two decades has been north of Steeles."

The Schwartz-Reisman JCC is expected to open on the Lebovic campus in October, and a northern JCC summer camp is planned for this summer.

Kids, parents warned about suspicious man

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Several Toronto Jewish day schools issued warnings late last month about a potential danger to young teens from a man who they said may look like a member of the Orthodox community.

However, the man has since left for a treatment facility in the southwestern United States, according to a Dec. 22 e-mail that Rabbi Isser Pliner, dean of Eitz Chaim Schools, sent to parents.

In an earlier e-mail, on Dec. 19, Rabbi Pliner alerted parents that "a man who was raised in the Toronto Torah community... has recently tried to lure teenagers from our neighborhoods and our schools into inappropriate relationships and situations."

A follow-up e-mail the next day advised that the school had been asked by Toronto Police not to divulge the person's name, but it included a description of a male in his late 20s, 5 foot 10, approximately 175 to 200 pounds, clean shaven with olive skin, brown eyes, and dark, wavy hair.

The individual has been seen "dressed in a frum manner," according to the e-mail, which asked recipients to contact police if they see a person who matches the description "engaging in contact with children, or in proximity of a facility that deals with children."

In a third and final e-mail on the subject, Rabbi Pliner wrote, "While the dangers posed by this person have now, at least temporarily, abated, there is no room for laxity on our part as parents and educators."

He encouraged parents to contact the appropriate authorities if they have concerns about any person. "We must always remember it is our responsibility to ensure our children are as safe as we can reasonably make them, and that we have provided them with the tools and education they need to keep out of harm's way," he said.

> Police consulted, but are not investigating

In a phone interview, Rabbi Pliner said that the man "tried to make some overtures" to boys from another school in the neighbourhood south of Lawrence Avenue.

No one interviewed for this article would confirm whether the man is a convicted offender.

At Eitz Chaim, staff spoke to students in grades five to eight about awareness and self-protective behaviours, which were listed in one of Rabbi Pliner's e-mails:

- "Your body belongs to you."
- "How to say no."
- "There are no secrets from your parents, especially when someone says, 'Do not tell your parents.'"

In the Orthodox community, both police and "community activists" (askanim) were consulted about the situation, Rabbi Pliner said.

Paul Shaviv, director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, also sent an e-mail alert to parents.

He wrote that the man "is alleged to be a predator who is a danger to teenagers, especially boys. He is known to frequent synagogues. Please discreetly remind your children that they should never accept invitations or approaches from adults whom they do not know, and should immediately tell a responsible adult of any suspicious incidents."

The man had been "seen in and around Thornhill, and we have many students in that area," Shaviv told The CJN.

At Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, principal Mordechai Cohen and vice-principal Elisabeth Segal met with students who take public transit to advise them about safety.

In an e-mail to parents, Cohen said the students were not advised of the catalyst for the meeting. However, they were "reminded to always be alert and aware, and not to be lured by strangers even when they may look like rabbis."

Doron Horowitz, director of national security infrastructure for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), has been in touch with some of the Jewish schools about the situation. He emphasized that the man was not charged by police for any recent incidents. "From what I understand, he did not break any laws."

Horowitz commended the schools for their response and added that children should understand what constitutes inappropriate behaviour and know that they have options when faced with it.

Det. Scott McKay of 32 Division said police were consulted, but are not investigating the situation.

Student intern program seeks ongoing funding

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A successful bid to secure funding for JVS' Kohn Summer Intern Program after the expiration of a three-year UJA Federation of Greater Toronto grant has ensured the initiative will continue into 2012.

The four-year-old Kohn Summer Intern Program places about 15 post-secondary students in professional positions in leading Jewish agencies in the Toronto area for 10 weeks every year.

It was initially funded largely by a three-year grant from UJA Federation's community fund. When the grant expired in 2010, federation found an anonymous donor to fund the program's fourth year in 2011. But Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) Toronto had yet to find money to cover the stipends of participating interns for 2012.

JVS then established a fundraising committee to attract donors, and so far, the committee and staff from Hillel of Greater Toronto have managed to raise the $85,000 required to run the initiative in 2012.

JVS Toronto president and CEO Frank Markel said the committee and Hillel appealed to families of past Kohn interns, as well as to potential donors and those who have donated in the past, and called on participating agencies to increase their own per-student contributions from $1,250 to $2,000.

Markel said that when he assumed his role with JVS in July, he was struck by the board of directors' determination to keep the program alive.

"The board of JVS was very strong in wanting to find a way to continue the program. Even before I had started, I went to the June meeting and I heard about what a tragedy it would be if the program were lost," Markel said.

He said that the initiative is named after the late Annie Kohn, who, along with her husband Thomas, was an active member of Clanton Park Synagogue. It aims "to create the seeds of the generation that will carry on the very noble Jewish tradition of helping others. Ideally, 20 years from now, the person who may be sitting in my seat will be a Kohn graduate. That's the dream – to inculcate future leaders."

There are about 15 Jewish agencies in Toronto – including Ve'ahavta: The Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto, and Jewish Family and Child – that take on an intern for the summer.

"The interns work four days a week for the agency, and on the Friday, they gather as a group under the auspices of Hillel and Rabbi Aaron Greenberg... where they learn about Jewish traditions and values, they have speakers, and a chance to discuss amongst themselves their experience," Markel said.

"The Friday program gives them a chance to put the work they're doing into context. It's a very nice combination of hands-on practical work and a chance to think and learn about the meaning of the work they do."

Jessica Pollock, a 2011 Kohn intern and a CJN columnist, wrote a piece about her experiences working with the Kehilla Residential Programme, federation's affordable housing agency, in which she explained why it's so important to the future of the Jewish community.

"I came into this internship wanting to acquire beneficial experience in the Jewish nonprofit world. I wanted an insider's look into how a small-scale non-profit agency such as Kehilla operates and a better conception of its need in our community," Pollock wrote in a column last fall.

"The professionals at Kehilla, the individuals I have come in contact with on Fridays, and of course the other interns themselves, have all motivated me to continue giving back to the community that has already given so much to me."

Although Markel didn't want to speculate about whether JVS will be able to find funding for the program beyond 2012, he said the agency will continue exploring other sources of money.

"Hopefully, the economy will start to rebound and some of the funding sources will be in a position where they can be more generous."

Israel must uphold the law

Not even for one day since its birth some 63 years ago has the Jewish state known peace or normal bilateral relations with its neighbours. As a result, not surprisingly, Israeli governments have focused most of their policy attention on defence and foreign affairs.

For six decades, existential threats have commanded the agenda. The Israeli public has understood this and usually made allowances for the imperfections of a country beset on all sides by enemies. But some of those imperfections, through years of inattention and neglect, appear to have festered into deeper, sub-stratum societal wounds that threaten to wreak a different, but still destructive, havoc on the Jewish state.

One of the most pressing societal threats in Israel is the blatant disrespect for the rule of law that characterizes certain pockets of the population. Specifically, we refer to the extremist, aggressive, violent behaviour of some haredi and zealous nationalist religious groups. To be sure, these groups constitute a very small, atypical sampling of the general population. But the danger to key, fundamental institutions of Israeli society is no less real for the small numbers of the thugs and disrespecters of basic human rights.

One particular sect of the haredi community in Beit Shemesh has been the most recent example of the grossly abusive behaviour by the very few against the many, harassing, abusing and bullying women for reasons they justify by their narrow, mysogynist view of our religion. (See the related news story in this edition.)

Religious, nationalist zealots have recently attacked Arabs and Jews alike in the name of their vain, misguided attestation of "God's will." They even attacked an Israeli army base, injuring the base's commander.

The government and the leaders of Israel must urgently turn their focus to these non-military threats to the Jewish state. Religious leaders who wield influence over the offending haredim and zealots must denounce the extremism that has increasingly become their followers' trademark. The government must enforce and uphold the rule of law. It is gratifying that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that he will act against "anyone who harasses women, anyone who harasses people in the public sphere." He reiterated earlier comments: "While we will use all legal means at our disposal… this is not just a legal issue. It is also a social issue."

The long-range, structural correction however, requires the larger mainstream political parties to amend a flawed electoral system that confers inordinately disproportionate political and thus financial power in the hands of small, single-issue, single-constituency, political parties, many of whose followers and loyalists feel empowered by their foothold in the electoral system to brazenly flout the law of the land.

The wider common good must finally trump narrow self-interest in the politics of the Jewish state.

25 years ago in The CJN

Canadian Jewish Congress criticized a Supreme Court of Canada ruling that upheld Ontario's Sunday closing law, despite acknowledging it infringed on freedom of religion. CJC said the law and ruling failed to reflect Canada's multicultural nature and penalized Saturday Sabbath observers, because they could only open Sundays with up to seven employees.

Says writer got the facts wrong

It seems that Harry Schachter, who wrote the article "Settlements an impediment to peace" (Dec. 8), is in need of an atlas, a history book and recent newspapers. Ever since Arabs were caught cutting down and damaging their olive trees in order to defame "settlers," accusations that settlers have done these evil acts have lessened. Perhaps that's why he is in need of relying on his data from the "impartial" United Nations. Gilo, which according to Schachter is in east Jerusalem, is actually in southern Jerusalem. He omits to say that the "Palestinian" application for admission as a state to the United Nations is a repudiation of every agreement signed by the Palestinian Authority. He omits to state that the Arab demand that Israel freeze settlement construction is a new demand, first raised by U.S. President Barack Obama, and that no such demand appears in any of the signed agreements between Israel and the PA. Moreover, he omits to write that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Natanyahu did freeze building for 10 months, but the Palestinians still did not return to the negotiating table.

He seems unaware that the Fourth Geneva Convention does not apply to Judea and Samaria and that, according to international law, valid to this day, Jews are allowed to settle in this area. More disturbing is his description of the historic part of Jewish Jerusalem as "Arab." What is totally obscene, however, is when, by implication, he equates the killing of Arab terrorists with the murder of the Fogel family – three children and their parents – five of the eight settlers he feels compelled to mention that have been killed by Palestinians.

Attack masquerades as academic discourse

The "academic" aspect of the paper "A Comparison of the Olive Oil Industries in Tuscany and Palestine," presented at the recent olive-oil conference at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto, was rather tenuous ("Propaganda in an academic guise," Dec. 8). There were no comparisons of the Palestinian example with relevant examples such as Israeli olive-oil production, Palestinians working inside Israel, etc. The speaker even admitted that "Tuscany" was basically an excuse to concentrate on Palestinians.

This is not the first attack against Israel I have witnessed in academic conferences, though usually the papers have had more academic merit. My own university union local has an entrenched anti-Israel policy that I am constantly trying to mitigate – not because I think there is nothing to criticize about Israel (or any other country), but because this attitude flies against academic principles and indeed the local's own equality statement. There is no reason to tacitly or implicitly condone attacks on Israel – or any country or culture – just because these attacks claim immunity by masquerading as academic discourse.

Misleading headline

In the Dec. 8 issue, The CJN published an article with the headline "Last shul in downtown Ottawa sells building," referring to Congregation Beth Shalom. However, the headline is misleading. It is not the last shul. There is one more synagogue in downtown Ottawa – the Orthodox Ohev Yisroel, located at 516 Rideau St., only two blocks away from Congregation Beth Shalom. We wish to assure your readers that, just as our shul has hosted travellers, tourists and businesspeople from all over the world in the past, so, too, shall we continue to do so for many years to come. Shabbat hospitality is always offered to guests.

Surgeon was a trailblazer

I was very happy to see my father, Herb Fitterman, mentioned in Sheldon Kirshner's column "The passing parade," (Dec. 22). My father was a man of accomplishment, a surgeon who performed the first implant operation in Canada despite huge opposition, a wonderful husband and father, a generous member of the community, an athlete who chafed at his body breaking down, a reader, a traveller and a bon vivant. His last name, however, was, like mine, Fitterman, not Fetterman.

Czech Jews enjoy Havel's revolution

Ruth Ellen Gruber
JTA

PRAGUE — On the first night of Chanukah, I stood in the splendid reception hall of the U.S. ambassador's residence in Prague as the ambassador himself lit the first candle in an imposing gilded menorah and chanted the blessings over the flames.

Since it was the first night of the holiday, these included the Shehecheyanu – the thankful blessing recited when reaching a special or long-awaited moment.

How strangely fitting to recite this, I thought, at this very time and in this very place. Two days earlier, Vaclav Havel had died, and many people were still in shock at the loss of the shy dissident playwright who had led the Velvet Revolution that ousted the Communist regime in 1989 and gone on to become Czechoslovakia's – and then the Czech Republic's – first democratically elected president and enduring moral compass.

Masses of candles in Havel's memory were glowing on Wenceslas Square, site of the huge demonstrations that had toppled the regime. And plans were going ahead for the sombre state funeral.

Why at this sad moment of mourning did I feel that the Shehecheyanu was fitting?

It was because, in a way, I felt it was a blessing that honoured Havel himself, for without him and the impact he had, this Chanukah evening – and what it represented – could not have taken place.

Joined by his family and a few guests, Ambassador Norman Eisen lit the first candle ahead of his official holiday reception for hundreds of diplomats and political and cultural figures. Throughout the evening, the menorah blazed at one end of the hall, while a huge decorated Christmas tree, placed there by the U.S. government as part of its decoration of this public space, glittered at the other.

"It's my first Christmas tree ever," Eisen, the son of an Auschwitz survivor from the former Czechoslovakia and an observant Jew who had had the residence kitchen koshered, joked to the crowd as waiters threaded through with trays of latkes.

Eisen opened his welcoming remarks by asking for a minute of silence in Havel's honour. Then he told the story of the residence – a mansion that had been built by a wealthy Jewish family, the Petscheks, in the late 1920s. The family left in 1938, before World War II broke out. During the war, it served as the residence of the head of the German army occupying Prague. Afterward, the mansion became Czechoslovak property until 1948, when the United States purchased it.

There were quite a few Jews at the reception, old friends of mine from the Prague Jewish community such as Leo Pavlat, director of the Prague Jewish Museum, who delightedly told me how he and Eisen had seats next to each other in synagogue. I was there to make a formal presentation of a big website project I am co-ordinating on Jewish heritage in Europe.

I couldn't help but think back.

The postwar Communist regime had carried out a policy of persecution aimed at stifling Jewish life, and the state-appointed community leadership had followed the party line, routinely issuing statements critical of Israel. In May 1989, Pavlat had spearheaded a group of young Prague Jews who sharply criticized these regime-approved aparatchiks. He and his friends warned that Jewish life in Czechoslovakia was "in danger of extinction."

The Velvet Revolution, with Havel as its reluctant hero, changed everything.

One of Havel's first acts as president was to reinstate full religious freedom. And one of his first state trips abroad was to Israel, bringing with him an entourage of 180 Prague Jews. By the end of 1990, Pavlat was serving as a diplomat in the Czechoslovak embassy in Israel. He remained there until 1994, when he returned to Prague and took up the directorship of the Jewish Museum.

At the ambassador's reception, I reminisced about those heady days, and about Havel's impact, with Tomas Kraus, who has served as executive director of the Federation of Czech Jewish communities since 1991. Kraus helped organize Havel's first trip to Israel and had been part of the Jewish delegation that accompanied him.

"It was exciting," Kraus recalled. "It was part of the 'Velvet Europhoria.' Everything that we had not dared to dream of was immediately possible. The Holy Land had been a philosophical term for us, an image of something that you would never be able to reach – only in a dream. And then, overnight, it was a reality."

That trip to Israel, he said, was "a very symbolic way to show what Czech foreign policy would be. It was a very important sign of what his priorities would be."

On the domestic front, too, Kraus recalled, Havel had been extremely important. Not just with his condemnation of antisemitism, but with the active role he played in addressing issues such as restitution of Jewish property and in awarding one of the highest state honours to Nicholas Winton, who organized the Czech kindertransport to rescue some 669 Jewish children on the eve of World War II.

"Havel's passing will leave a very big gap," Kraus said. "Since he left office, he was in a position without concrete power. But sometimes a moral authority is stronger than armies."ww

Havel was a friend and champion of freedom

Ron Kampeas
JTA

Vaclav Havel was a friend of the Jews and of Israel, but prominent Jews who mourned his passing last month said the Czech leader's greatest legacy was his universal message of freedom.

"Vaclav Havel was one of the few islands of intellectual freedom in the sea of totalitarian rule," Natan Sharansky told JTA, speaking of the late 1960s and the 1970s, when both he and Havel were struggling against Communist rule – Havel in the former Czechoslovakia and Sharansky in the former Soviet Union.

Havel, a dissident playwright and human rights champion, helped lead Prague's 1989 Velvet Revolution and was a hero in the Cold War struggle for democracy in Soviet-dominated eastern Europe. In 1977, he was a co-author of the human rights manifesto Charter 77, which became the catalyst for the Czech dissident cause.

Just weeks after the collapse of Communism, Havel was elected president of Czechoslovakia, on Dec. 29, 1989.

After the Czech Republic and Slovakia separated into two countries in 1993, he was elected president of the Czech Republic and served until 2003.

Sharansky learned of – and said he was not surprised by – Havel's Jewish connections later in life. But in 1977, when Sharansky was sent to Siberia, the universalist message of Charter 77 gave him succor.

"He played an important role in keeping the spark alive," said Sharansky, now chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel. "He launched a counter attack which liberated people intellectually, and then physically."

Havel demonstrated his commitment to Jewish causes by making one of his first foreign trips after becoming Czechoslovak president a three-day visit to Israel in April 1990. He was accompanied by 180 Czech Jews. In 2010, he was one of the founding members of the Friends of Israel group of international political figures.

Havel's last public appearance was on Dec. 10, when he met with the Dalai Lama and signed an appeal in support of dissidents around the world. He died Dec. 18 at 75, apparently from respiratory ailments.

Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust memorialist and Nobel peace laureate who met frequently with Havel after he became president of Czechoslovakia and then of the Czech Republic, said Havel was proud of his nation's Jewish heritage.

"He spoke a lot of Jewish philosophy and study," Wiesel told JTA.

The European Jewish Congress called Havel a "great friend of the Jews" who "did much to confront antisemitism and teach the lessons of the dark chapter of the Holocaust during his two terms in office."

The Federation of Czech Jewish Communities said Jews respected Havel as a statesman and a world-renowned writer, and felt close to him "as a friend who had an understanding of human concerns and joys."

Sharansky said Havel's courage as a dissident long outlasted Czechoslovakia's emergence from Communism. It was Havel's reputation that led Sharansky to convene the 2007 Democracy and Security International Conference in Prague in 2007.

Havel, along with Sharansky and former Spanish prime minister Jose Maria Aznar, was a co-chairman of the conference, although Havel was mostly absent – his illness already had hobbled him. But his message pervaded the proceedings.

"His moral clarity, his courage, his charm, his sense of humour really influenced many people at the conference," Sharansky said. "His experience was their experience, whether they came from Egypt, from Iran, from Iraq, from Sudan."

Havel and Aznar were co-founders of Friends of Israel, a group of European leaders who sought to counter growing anti-Israel rhetoric on the continent.

That's where Havel's appreciation for Jews and Israel and his deep commitment to human rights converged.

It was a stance the pro-Israel community appreciated, said Daniel Mariaschin, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith International. "At a time when many European leaders find the opportunity to upbraid Israel, he would stand his ground, seeing Israel as a strong democracy in the place of nations," he said.

Ruth Ellen Gruber contributed to this report from Prague.

Lives that touch lives

In this space I'd like to celebrate the formidable accomplishments of two women who changed the shape of my world. Although neither was related to me, in each case their recent passing struck me with the force of family loss. The Jewish tradition has much to say about mourning not only close family, but also teachers, and these two women taught me much and deeply.

Ida Fink, the Polish-born Israeli writer, passed away in the fall after several years of declining health. Born in 1921, she survived the Nazi genocide by posing as a non-Jewish Polish labourer with her younger sister. In 1957, she moved to Israel and began the difficult process of learning a new language in her 30s.

She had planned to be a pianist, but her studies at the conservatory were halted with the German invasion of Poland. Instead, she wrote. Her stunning short stories and her novel were masterpieces, focusing on the telling detail of life under the shadow of Nazi atrocity – intimate glimpses of family life, betrayal, sacrifice, and moments of realization that all was changed, lost irrevocably.

I encountered her writing when the New Yorker published one of her stories. I was riveted by its quiet force and wisdom. The next time I travelled to Israel, I contacted her. I was a young professor of literature, just beginning my career, and I had planned to interview her for a literary journal. I borrowed a tape recorder, and met her at her home in Holon one summer morning.

We talked for a while, and during a lull in the conversation, I sensed that this was the moment to ask her consent for an interview. I was certain she would agree. But I also felt, at that moment, that I was at a crossroads. I could take out my tape recorder and do the interview, which would advance my career, or I could leave the tape recorder tucked in my purse, and instead have a friendship.

I chose the friendship. We spent the afternoon in conversation and met several times that month. I spent time with her whenever I was in Israel or she in North America.

Over the course of years, which turned into decades, our friendship deepened. I was privileged to know a woman who, like the writing itself, was wise, sensitive, strong, compassionate, and complex. More than admire her as a writer, I came to love her as a person. I feel her loss profoundly.

The brilliant Jewish historian Paula Hyman passed away in mid-December after a fierce battle against cancer, a disease she had fought and defeated several times since her early 30s. Although not much older than I, Paula was already a legend by the time I entered graduate school. She began her academic career at a time when universities were not very welcoming to female professors, and when commitments to family life were considered a barrier to professional advancement for women. If this was true of for professors generally, it was even more pronounced in Jewish studies, where there were precious few women professors. Paula was a pioneer.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

We watched her meteoric rise with awe and pride: first a professor at Columbia, then a very young dean at the Jewish Theological Seminary, finally the head of Jewish studies at Yale. She was among the first to bring the perspective of gender to Jewish studies, asking (and answering) questions about women's place in shaping the Jewish experience. Through the quality of her thinking and the force of her personality, she opened doors that the rest of us could walk through.

She had strong commitments to Judaism, Jewish feminism and Zionism. She was the consummate mentor, guiding, inspiring and supporting students and colleagues. At a recent memorial, friends, colleagues and students gathered to remember her and the impact she had on our lives and our work.

Through all the recounted anecdotes, the same words surfaced: courageous, forthright, principled and strong, but also compassionate, nurturing, gracious and generous. It was my good fortune to work with her, learn from her and be guided by her example.

My world feels diminished without them. May their names continue to be a blessing.

Making our secularism Jewish

Among the countless answers to what it means to be a Jew, two seem to be particularly common in the Diaspora. The religious answer focuses on synagogue affiliation, while the secular one uses philanthropy as a criterion. If you care about Judaism, you're likely to belong to a shul. If you're committed to Jewishness, you're expected to give money to Jewish causes, often linked to Israel.

Neither of these criteria makes much sense to Israelis. They come from a world where most Jews don't belong to synagogues, even when they use them. They see no reason to change their ways here. This sets them apart from communities here.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

And despite their commitment to Israel, they're less likely to make donations to institutions that support Israeli projects, because they tend to send money directly, e.g., by providing for relatives, keeping up homes and visiting often. They could cite data that suggest that their kind of investment benefits Israel more than charitable giving.

Israelis are usually able to fuse Judaism with Jewishness not through synagogue or charity, but through the culture they brought with them. Even when it's ostensibly secular, Israeli cultural life is often rooted in Jewish sources and reflects well what it means to be a Jew in our time.

This makes it different from contemporary Jewish secularism in the Diaspora that usually seeks to imitate the non-Jewish world rather than attempt to present an indigenous alternative. Here the Jewish dimension is often confined to trivial nostalgia, stodgy food and stale humour.

I recently had reason to appeal to Israelis in Toronto to help make our secularism more Jewish. We may not need Israeli input when it comes to the way we practise Judaism. In fact, we can teach them much about religious pluralism and current relevant manifestations of the Jewish faith. But we need them to show us how to be richly Jewish even without explicit references to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

Using the well-worn cliché, I urged Israelis not to ask themselves what the Jewish community can do for them, but what they can do for the Jewish community. Many have been raised in a vibrant Jewish culture rooted in the Hebrew language and Jewish history, informed by traditional Jewish texts and manifest in national solidarity. We need them to teach us how to do more of it here.

The flowering of Jewish life in Israel today, which – despite the pressure that popular American culture is exerting everywhere – manifests itself in the output of internationally renowned writers and scholars, is indicative of the spiritual wealth to which Israelis have access. I urged them to share some of it with us and resist the temptation to look down on galut Jews.

But in order to rise to the challenge, Israelis must first free themselves from two prevalent myths of their own: they must disabuse themselves of the fantasy that most are only here temporarily, and they must accept that the Diaspora is here to stay as an accepted Jewish way of life and as an indispensible partner of the State of Israel.

That's why last month's ill-conceived and provocative advertisements that sought to frighten Israelis into returning home created such a furor in the United States and had to be withdrawn by the government of Israel.

Doctrinaire Israeli politicians may argue that all Jews must live in Israel to prevent assimilation and ensure a Jewish majority on both sides of the Green Line. But that's not about to happen. Nor should it happen, because the liquidation of the Diaspora would destroy Judaism and threaten the very existence of the Jewish state.

For Israelis to refuse to engage with local Jewish communities on the erroneous assumption that Diaspora Jews are moving toward extinction is morally, tactically and factually wrong,

Because life is good for most Jews here, a growing number of Israelis – perhaps as much as one-fifth of Canadian Jewry – have chosen to share it. By also sharing with us of who they are, they'll enrich our Jewish life and enjoy the privilege of giving of themselves.

The event I spoke at was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in a laudable effort to promote co-operation. It's one of many signs that the organized Jewish community is anxious to welcome Israelis with open arms. I hope they'll respond in kind.

Conservatives impugn Obama's pro-Israel record

With primaries in a succession of U.S. states looming and the presidential election just about 10 months away, conservatives in the United States have turned Israel into a wedge issue.

Israel has been thrust into the centre of the debate both by candidates vying for the Republican party nomination and their respective supporters. In a year when the U.S. economy is faltering, Israel has emerged as a key issue among Republican politicians scrambling to impress two completely different constituencies: Jews and evangelical Christians.

Jews constitute only two per cent of the overall population, but have been critical in swing states – Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida, among others – and have been useful as campaign donors. Evangelical Christians, who outnumber Jews by a huge margin, tend to vote as a bloc.

For decades now, the vast majority of Jews have voted for the Democrats in presidential elections. In 2008, almost eight out of 10 Jewish voters cast their ballots for Barack Obama, the Democratic standard bearer who defeated Republican John McCain. But these facts have not deterred the Republicans.

Buoyed by a recent byelection in New York City in which Republican candidate Bob Turner posted an upset victory over Democratic rival David Weprin for the vacant congressional seat of disgraced Democrat Anthony Weiner, Republicans figure that unconditional support for Israel may well pay hefty dividends come November.

Virtually all the current Republican candidates, from Mitt Romney to Newt Gingrich, have adopted hawkish pro-Israel positions and portray President Obama as insufficiently supportive of the Jewish state.

Romney, claiming that Obama wants "to undermine" Israel, "our longtime friend and ally," says that he treats it with "suspicion and distrust." Romney believes that Israel should not be pressured to make concessions to the Palestinians in the interests of reaching an agreement.

Gingrich, while supporting a two-state solution, claims that the Palestinians are an "invented people," a comment that heartens Israeli rejectionists opposed to territorial compromise. Rick Perry says that Israel should be permitted to build settlements in the West Bank and that eastern Jerusalem should remain in Israel's hands.

Clearly, Republicans are trying to define Obama as a fair-weather friend of Israel, focusing on a speech he delivered last May in which he espoused a two-state solution based on the pre-1967 borders and mutually agreed land swaps. Like many Israelis, Obama thinks that Israel's status as a Jewish and democratic nation can best be assured via this route. Romney, however, claimed that Obama had "thrown Israel under the bus," while Perry described the plan as "insulting and naive."

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

And in a further bid to curry favour with targeted voters, Perry has lambasted Obama's "policy of moral equivalence" in which Israel and the Palestinian Authority are equally blamed for the impasse in the peace process.

In an attempt to besmirch Obama, their ideological bedfellows have bought full-page ads in major American newspapers.

Last September, in a surreal assertion, the David Horowitz Freedom Center claimed that Obama is "the most anti-Israel president in American history," a claim that John Bolton, the former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, echoed.

The centre, in a litany of unsubstantiated accusations, said that Obama had publicly "humiliated" Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, demanded that Israel "surrender its right to defend its border," compelled Israel to make dangerous concessions to the Palestinians and treated Israel "as an enemy."

Meanwhile, the Emergency Committee for Israel has suggested that Obama is not pro-Israel and has posed a rhetorical question: "Why does the Obama administration treat Israel like a punching bag?"

These fantastical claims have not surprised Obama or his supporters.

While campaigning in 2008, Obama aptly observed, "There is a strain within the pro-Israel community that says unless you adopt an unwavering pro-Likud approach to Israel that you're anti-Israel." Debbie Wasserman Schultz, the chair of the Democratic National Committee, has correctly labelled attacks on Obama's record as "deliberate distortions."

More to the point, Republican claims are hotly disputed by Israel's leadership.

President Shimon Peres has called Obama "a friend of the Jewish people and the State of Israel." Defence Minister Ehud Barak has declared, "Obama is an ally and friend of Israel. The Obama administration gives backing to Israel's security in a wide, all-encompassing and unprecedented manner."

Praising Obama's opposition to the Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence at the United Nations last autumn, Netanyahu gushed that he had earned a "badge of honour." Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, an arch conservative as well, described Obama's address as "the speech of an ally."

Surveying the current Israel-U.S. relationship, Zalman Shoval, Israel's former ambassador to the United States and a Likud stalwart, said, "I've never felt such strong support for Israel in Washington."

Shoval's assessment rings true.

Like his predecessors, Obama has had tactical, but not strategic, disagreements with Israel. These disputes have usually concerned the status of the territories captured by Israel in the Six Day War, the depth of the withdrawals Israel should undertake to achieve peace with its Arab neighbours and, now, the legality of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Golan Heights under international law.

To the Obama administration, the settlements are "illegitimate" and an obstacle to peace, as Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has stated. On the basis of this principle, Washington has condemned Israeli plans to expand settlements beyond the old Green Line. Nonetheless, the United States vetoed a UN resolution last summer condemning Israel's settlement activity.

Although Obama promotes an accord based on the 1967 armistice lines, he says that they are a starting rather than an end point for negotiations, and that peace cannot be externally imposed.

The Obama administration's pro-Israel record goes deeper. Apart from having opposed the unilateral Palestinian request for full UN membership, it cut off funding to UNESCO after its support of this position. Washington played a key role in mobilizing international opposition to last summer's Gaza flotilla, strongly backed Israel's right to defend itself after the publication of the Goldstone report and refused to attend a Durban anti-racism conference followup meeting. Washington, too, has been trying to block Iran's path to a nuclear arsenal and continues to defend Israel's legitimacy.

U.S. military assistance to Israel, which has reached the annual $3-billion level, is supplemented to the tune of $235 million so that Israel can deploy more Iron Dome anti-rocket batteries. And significantly, Israel is one of the few countries permitted to buy the F-35 stealth fighter jet.

Obama has repeatedly called U.S. bonds with Israel "unbreakable" and "unshakable," and, unlike previous presidents whose conservative credentials were unquestioned, he has not suspended the flow of weapons to Israel.

Obama has admitted that some of his encounters with Netanyahu have been tense. But to extrapolate from this that he is not pro-Israel is unadulterated nonsense.

A roundabout proof of Israeli democracy

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last month, an unusual story by Herb Keinon appeared in the Jerusalem Post. Keinon revealed that Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, had decided to "respectfully decline" a request from the New York Times to submit an opinion piece to the paper.

And what was the reason for passing up this opportunity? According to Keinon, Netanyahu's senior media adviser, Ron Dermer, explained in a letter to the Times that the paper's hostile editorial stance toward Netanyahu and the fact that, since September, 19 out of 20 of the paper's opinion pieces on Israel were negative were key issues in the decision. In this atmosphere, an article by Israel's leader would amount to little other than tokenism. As Dermer put it: "We wouldn't want to be seen as 'Bibiwashing' the op-ed page of the New York Times."

Keinon explained that Dermer was referring to a November piece called "Israel and Pinkwashing" in which Israel was criticized for, as Dermer put it, "having the temerity to champion its record on gay rights."

The exception to the string of one-sided opinion pieces was the appearance of Judge Richard Goldstone's Nov. 1 piece, "Israel and the Apartheid Slander." Goldstone, the South African judge who headed the UN commission report on the Gaza war that bears his name, not only countered this false charge but also sought "to separate legitimate criticism of Israel from assaults that aim to isolate, demonize and delegitimize it."

Ironically, last spring, Goldstone's article recanting the principal charge in the Goldstone report – that Israeli soldiers had deliberately killed Palestinian civilians during the January 2009 Gaza war – had to appear in the Washington Post when the New York Times, as widely reported, refused to publish it.

The Times' standard editorial line places virtually all the responsibility for the impasse in the peace process at Netanyahu's doorstep (even though it's Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas who has been refusing to return to the negotiating table without preconditions).

Beyond this trend, what seems to have angered Israeli government officials was the appearance of a particularly troubling line in one of Thomas Friedman's December columns. After expressing concern about where Israel is headed and about the erosion of support for – and even interest in – Israel that he senses among secular American Jews, Friedman wrote something that to many, both in Israel and abroad, was not only intemperate but, uncharacteristically for him, smacked of an insidious anti-Israel canard: "I sure hope that Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, understands that the standing ovation he got in Congress this year was not for his politics. That ovation was bought and paid for by the Israel lobby."

Friedman also underscored his critique of Israel, including threats to its democracy, by commending Ha'aretz columnist Gideon Levy as a "powerful liberal voice." In fact, Levy and his colleague Amira Hass are avowedly radical and arguably anti-Zionist, and they're typically as harsh toward Israel, including its "liberals," as the self-proclaimed "anarcho-syndicalist" Noam Chomsky is toward the United States. Yet, as Friedman must know, the Times would never have Chomsky as even a guest columnist, let alone a resident one. When Ha'aretz no longer has, or is allowed to have, Levy and Hass writing for it (an event that's difficult to foresee), people who bemoan the erosion of Israeli democracy will genuinely have reason to express bitter disapproval.

None of this is to say that Israel need have no concern about safeguarding its democracy, including being vigilant about efforts to introduce illiberal legislation or accept certain practices that erode equal treatment for women, the Arab minority, and so on. It does mean, however, keeping Israel in perspective, treating it with equanimity. We cannot forget that most Israelis came from countries with no democratic tradition and have since lived through wars, terrorism and constant threats that would have made normal life unbearable for almost any other society. Indeed, the real story is why Israel has been able to remain so democratically resilient – even vibrant – under extraordinary circumstances.

Winnipeg federation gets new president

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israel Ludwig (Rael to his friends), the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's newly appointed president, says he's lucky to be leading the community at a time when things are going well.

In his first address as president, at the federation board meeting Dec. 8, Ludwig noted that Winnipeg's CJA campaign is continuing to grow (the goal is $5.5 million this year) while most other campaigns are either flat or declining, the community is registering consistent population growth (with projections of reaching 20,000 within the next five years from an estimated 17,000 currently), and the kindergarten to Grade 12 Gray Academy and the campus daycare are both bursting at the seams.

"Those [crowded conditions at the school and day care] are good problems to have," he said.

A lawyer by profession, Ludwig is no stranger to the federation or community leadership. A lifelong Winnipegger who grew up in the north end, Ludwig was chair of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights' Midwest region back in the early 1980s.

He was first recruited to the board of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (the federation's predecessor) by Marjorie Blankstein in 1985. In this first community involvement, he served on the board for 13 years. During that time, he also became a member of the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress and served as vice-president and chair of the Manitoba region.

He stepped down from the board in 1998 to concentrate on his legal career. He noted that he was encouraged to rejoin the federation board in 2004 by Neil Duboff, one of his partners at Duboff Edwards Haight & Schachter, who was federation president at that time.

In his first remarks as federation president, Ludwig praised his predecessor, Ben Cohen, as well as Hope and Howard Morry, the CJA campaign co-chairs for the past two years; federation executive director Bob Freedman and the federation's staff.

Ludwig promised to be an accessible president. "I am available at any time," he said. "I encourage anyone to call me or send me an e-mail. My door is always open.

"Part of my philosophy is that all members of a board should be engaged," he added, as he encouraged every federation board member to sign up for a committee.

He said his primary goal as president is to work toward securing the Winnipeg Jewish community institutions' financial futures.

"There are a number of Jewish agencies and organizations that are not part of the federation," he noted. "I would like to see all of our community agencies under the federation umbrella, not only as potential beneficiaries, but also so that we can help with problem solving and outreach."

Cash shortfall delays human rights museum

Opening now set for 2014 at earliest

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Canadian Museum for Human Rights has announced that a funding shortfall will delay its opening for another year or more.

While the physical structure will be completed next year as planned, the museum won't open in 2013, as had been previously announced. Due to a cash crunch that's reportedly as high as $45 million, the museum won't open until at least 2014, and possibly later.

"We are looking to our capital campaign to make up the shortfall," said Angela Cassie, the museum's director of communications and external relations.

"We are exploring all options in trying to determine what is feasible or achievable. We will have a better idea of how much we need in a few months time. We don't want to move ahead with the interior work until we can be sure that we can pay the contractors."

The three levels of government are most likely not the answer. On Nov. 30, Ottawa turned down a request from the museum's board for more funding, and the province is close to $1 billion in debt. The City of Winnipeg approved an additional $3.6 million for the project last spring after repeatedly turning down earlier requests.

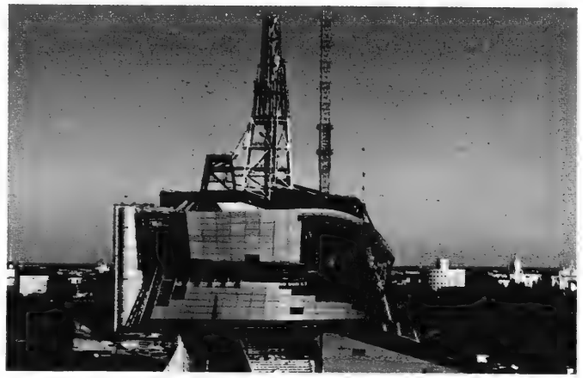
Thus far, the federal government has contributed $100 million for construction of the first national museum to be built outside Ottawa, and it has pledged to cover $21.7 million a year in operating costs. The province has provided $40 million for construction costs, and the city has given $20 million.

The Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights – led by Gail Asper, daughter of media mogul Israel Asper, who first proposed the project in 2003 – has generated $130 million in private donations. The group's goal was $150 million.

And although the museum is still two years or more away from opening, Winnipeg Sun columnist Tom Brodbeck reported on Dec. 20, that staff salaries are already costing $11 million a year.

Bernie Bellan, owner, publisher and editor of Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News newspaper, isn't surprised about the current situation. He first reported on the museum's cost overruns in November 2010.

"When Israel Asper first proposed this project in 2003, the plan called for a $200-million structure to be completed in three or four years," he said. "Now it is $310 million and rising, and the opening date is still unknown. This project is out of control."



The museum currently under construction

Cassie put a positive spin on the delayed opening, saying it buys museum staff more time to fine-tune the facility's content and get it right. "This delay isn't a bad thing," she said. "We are working toward exceeding expectations."

Cash shortages aren't the only issues dogging the museum. Both its COO and chief knowledge officer resigned in 2011, and the chair of its board – prominent Winnipeg businessman Arni Thorsteinson – is resigning as of Jan. 1. Cassie noted, however, that he'll remain involved as a board member of the Friends group.

Then there is the ongoing question of where the Holocaust fits into the new museum. The original plan was for a separate gallery for the Holocaust, based on the role it played in the postwar development of international human rights bodies and legislation.

But from the beginning of the project, the uniqueness of the Shoah has been challenged by a number of different Canadian ethnic groups, in particular by the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

Many in the Jewish community have expressed concern that the Holocaust gallery will be downsized or merged into a gallery that includes other large-scale atrocities. Cassie said the confusion may stem from discussion about a second gallery that shows how Canada has discriminated against minorities, including how it prevented Jews who were escaping the Holocause from entering Canada.

She said a standalone Holocaust gallery is still in the plans.

"The galleries [including a standalone aboriginal gallery] will unfold like the chapters in a book," Cassie said. "The journey needs to be seen as a whole. The Holocaust is an example of what happens when a society abandons the concept of universal human rights and dignity."

On a positive note, on Dec. 9, the museum and the government of the Netherlands signed a memorandum of understanding to collaborate for the promotion of human rights through joint projects and education.

McGill student seeks key Liberal post

Zach Paikin criticized for 'right wing views'

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Twenty-year-old McGill University student Zach Paikin is gearing up for the end of his campaign to become the next national policy chair of the Liberal party, to be chosen at its biennial convention Jan. 13-15.

Zach Paikin

But while Paikin, the son of Steve Paikin, host of TVOntario's The Agenda, says he has strived to run a positive campaign, he's been the subject of an attack from 18-year-old Mount Allison University student Max Naylor, his close friend and the son of University of Toronto president David Naylor.

The younger Naylor published a blog post criticizing what he calls candidate Paikin's "extreme right wing views," which he says are a bad fit for the party.

"I don't have a problem with him running for this position, but if you're going to be a conservative, you should say that's what you are," Naylor said. "He is more right wing than the majority of liberal Canadians, which is reflected time and time again in his writings."

Paikin is a featured columnist for the right-wing online student newspaper the Prince Arthur Herald and a frequent guest on the Michael Coren Show. He has also spoken out about his strong support for Israel and his belief that the Arab Spring was a "victory for Iran in the Middle East."

The rivalry between Paikin and Naylor has garnered the attention of major media outlets, and even of Interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae, who tweeted that it was "bulls--t."

Paikin and Naylor became friends when they were both volunteering for the Young Liberals of Canada in the riding of Toronto-Centre. Naylor maintains that they were exceptionally close and that he knows Paikin better than any of his endorsers or opponents.

On his blog, Naylor criticizes Paikin's hardline views on the Middle East, his strong support for Israel and what he calls Paikin's conservative views on the economy and his advocacy of a two-tier health care system.

"Not a lot of people are aware to the extent that he had right-wing views. I've seen him do this before, and if we're going to rebuild the party, he needs to be honest about what he believes in," Naylor said.

But Paikin counters that in order to bring the Liberal party back to its former glory, new ideas are necessary. "Anyone who goes out there and says we need to adhere to some sort of liberal orthodoxy is out to lunch. What we need is clear, bold ideas. That's going to require change," he said.

He has spent the past few months travelling across Canada to find out what change Canadians want to see.

"What struck me the most during the course of my travels is that Liberals across the country share the same values, which is ironic, because the Liberal party is criticized for not knowing what it stands for," Paikin said.

"I think the Liberal elite don't know what it stands for, and the time for that is over." He said his campaign plan focuses on increasing grassroots engagement, reducing obstacles to political involvement and creating a more inclusive party.

"We have inspired a lot of Liberals and have set a clear message to the elite that the grassroots of this party want change and want to embrace a new generation," he said.

However, Naylor says if Paikin is selected, he will create further divisions within the party. "You can't bring people together while having views that are going to divide people. He is very public on his hardline views on the Middle East, and he's said it's my way or the highway," Naylor said.

In an interview with CTV, Paikin called Naylor's blog post childish and full of baseless allegations. Instead, he said he wants to focus on running a positive and progressive campaign. "I don't let anything get in the way of what needs to be done: bringing Liberals together."

What is this, chopped liver?

Actually, yes.

Has there ever been a Jewish food more maligned? The perennial punch line. The bridesmaid of the brunch. Well it's time to show chopped liver a little love.

"Every ethnic cuisine has at least one dish that produces either nostalgia or nausea, depending on who it's placed in front of," so we are told at Judaism for Dummies. "Ashkenazi Jews have gehakte leber, or 'chopped liver.' Chopped liver – a dense mixture of chicken liver, onions, and hard-boiled egg – is a heart attack waiting to happen. Nonetheless, just thinking about chopped liver makes our mouths water and reminds us of our childhoods. For those of us who grew up with it, chopped liver is nostalgia food." [http://bit.ly/liver11]

The nostalgia oozes out of Stacey's chopped liver, especially when she thinks about her Grandma Dorothy's dish. "She served it as a first course during Jewish holidays on a bed of iceberg lettuce (does anyone buy iceberg lettuce anymore?) and scooped it out with an ice cream scoop… She had an old-fashioned meat grinder which she would use to grind the calves liver after broiling… I make this delicacy for Passover only, and it brings back a lot of good memories." [http://bit.ly/liver12]

The line, "What am I, chopped liver?" certainly has the cadence of a Yiddish catch phrase. But does it really have its roots in the mamaloshen? Here's the response from the Ohr Somayach rabbi: "As far as I know, the origins of the phrase are not Yiddish. I believe the phrase was originally coined in America. Being that chopped liver was always considered a side dish and not a main course, the phrase is used to express hurt and amazement when a person feels he has been overlooked and treated just like a 'side dish.'" [http://bit.ly/liver13]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

For the premier ode to this love-it-or-loathe-it food, we must credit Cantor Henry Rosenblum, who delivers his tribute to the tune of Ol' Man River (with apologies to Jerome Kern):

When I return to my Shabbes table/ After I spend so much time in shul/ I am so hungry that I am not able/ To keep far away from the dish so cruel…

Cold chopped liver/ That heartburn giver/ I shouldn't choose it/ But I can't refuse it/ It keeps me groanin'/ Just keeps me groanin' oy vey! [http://bit.ly/liver14]

By the way, this rendition originated during the cantor's stint as music-scholar-in-residence at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Despite all attempts to reform the reputation of this food, it's a mighty challenge when it gets no respect from the commander-in-chief and leader of the free world! In August 2009, U.S. President Barack Obama paid a visit to Belgrade, Mont. But the crowd voiced a measure of disappointment that the First Lady wasn't with him:

The president (addressing the crowd): I am excited to be back in Montana. (Cheers) I want to…

Question from the crowd: Where's Michelle?

The president: Where's Michelle? (Pointing to himself) Come on, what is this, chopped liver here? (Laughter) [http://bit.ly/liver15]

Oh, the ignominy of it all.

Spiritual lessons from the fire marshal

I occasionally attend Shabbat morning services in the basement of a local synagogue. The dingy room is uninspiring. The wallpaper is peeling, the celling is stained, the floor is uneven and there are no windows. There is one sign, however, that captures my attention and, in my moments of wandering, drives me back to prayer: "Occupancy by more than 125 people is unlawful and dangerous."

The fire marshal must have been an educator.

It strikes me that the sign needs to say that overcrowding is both "unlawful and dangerous." Prohibiting overcrowding on the basis of law alone would not suffice. We'd likely argue, "That's just a bureaucratic regulation!" and would ignore the sign. Similarly, justifying the rule solely on the grounds of reason wouldn't engender compliance. We would rationalize, "We'll make sure that there are extra fire extinguishers and that the exits are clearly marked, then we can squeeze in an extra 50 people, and it won't be dangerous." The fire marshal knew that in order to ensure compliance, she must apply both legal standards and moral compulsion.

In teaching Jewish practice, we take a similar approach. On one hand, we must teach our children communal norms. For some, these norms may be taught as the obligations of Halachah (Jewish law), by explaining to children that the Torah and rabbinic tradition command us to certain behaviours. For others, the obligation is represented as a set of communal or familial norms, binding children and community members to their practice. When a child asks, "Why can't I go to the party on Friday night?" we may reply, "Because we are commanded to keep Shabbat," or, "Because on Shabbat we have dinner as a family."

Class Act

For most Jews, however, establishing rules and expectations without grounding them in rational underpinnings undermines their legitimacy. For today's youth, "because that's what we do" rarely suffices. In this regard, we must imbue a sense of moral reasoning for the action and describe our understanding of their underlying value. We may describe Shabbat as special family time, a tradition reminiscent of God's creation or the world, or an opportunity to break from the regular workweek. We may speak of what Shabbat means to us and encourage our children to find their own meaning.

Michael Rosenak, a renowned philosopher of Jewish education, describes these two teachings as explicit and implicit Judaism. An explicit educational theology sees the rules as an end unto themselves. In Judaism, we are compelled by external commandments or communal expectations that dictate our actions. An implicit philosophy, on the other hand, seeks deep personal meaning and resonance for religious behaviours. An implicit education teaches Jews to explore both inter- and intra-personal motivations for ritual observance.

When my thoughts wander during Shabbat morning services and I see the fire marshal's sign, I am reminded of both explicit and implicit reasons for communal prayer. I recognize that I am commanded by Halachah and by communal norms to pray. At the same time, I find in prayer deep personal meaning, imbued by moments of introspection and spirituality. In teaching children, I strive to share these explicit and implicit motivations with my students.

A letter to the hilltop youth

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin
JTA

Guest Voice

As an educator, I know it's impossible to preach to people who believe that they are the holy defenders of the Land of Israel, that they wave the banner of the genuine Torah, that they are eliminating the conciliatory behaviour of thousands of years of exile.

"Price tag" rioters – right-wing nationalists who act violently to protest Israeli government policies – attack Palestinians who have done no wrong, desecrate mosques and see themselves as similar to the ancient heroes of Judea who fought the Greek-Syrian rabble that desecrated the Temple and forced them to bow to idols.

And I say: You consider yourselves the new Hasmoneans, the Maccabees who don't bow to the Hellenizing priestly establishment, which today, you believe, wears the uniform of the Israel Defence Forces. Because you are convinced that all your deeds are for the sake of heaven, you will never admit that you have sinned.

I am telling you that you are making a fundamental mistake.

If a country can be sacred, if there is sanctity in earth and stones, then isn't it clear that there is sanctity in man – Arab or Jew – who was created in God's image? Don't you understand that there is no "portion of God from above," as Job described it, in furrows of earth, but there certainly is in peaceful Palestinians?

Do you have any idea how great that "portion of God" is, for example, in Col. Ran Kahane, the commander of the Ephraim Brigade you attacked some days ago, and in his soldiers, who daily risk their lives to defend yours and those of your families from the terrorists who work to take them? How do you dare to desecrate these holy people? How did your love of the land become so distorted that it turned into love of bricks and cement and caused you to forget all the rest?

You did not throw stones at me, and still you have mortally wounded me. You have stolen one of the assets most sacred to me. I love the Land of Israel with all my heart. I left the United States, my birthplace, to help to build my beloved city of Efrat and to be built up in it. Wherever I speak, I present myself as a "proud settler." And you have robbed me of this pride. You have turned the term "settler" into a dirty word. You have caused me to be ashamed of being a settler, to be ashamed to be called by the same name as those whose love for the land has turned into hatred of human beings.

The Torah praises the Land of Israel, but it never commands us to "love" the land. It commands us to "love thy neighbour as thyself." And since the words that end that verse are: "I am the Lord," the medieval commentator Abraham Ibn Ezra explains that "thy neighbour" is every human being created in the image of God.

There is a direct and tragic connection between those who perpetrate "price tag" activities against Arabs and those who attack the IDF.

Simon and Levi, two of Jacob's sons, murdered all the men of Shechem, an act of revenge that did not distinguish between the guilty and the innocent. They ended up harming their own brother, Joseph, for, a midrash says, they were the motivating forces behind his sale into slavery in Egypt.

Please, change your minds and repent, before it's too late. Don't sell your souls, your portion of God from above, even in exchange for our holy land.

A need for balance in our lives

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

There is a famous Midrash (Tanchuma Lech Lecha 9) that states "ma'asai avot siman lebanim" (the acts of our patriarchs are a sign for us). In other words, whatever our forefathers experienced should serve as a lesson for us. With that in mind, let me share with you a verse in Genesis that might at first seem perplexing.

When Abraham is seeking to purchase a burial plot for his wife, Sarah, he approaches the Hittites and says (Gen. 23:4), "Ger v'toshav anochi imachem" (I am a stranger and a citizen together with you).

Abraham's statement seems to be contradictory. On the one hand, he says that he's a stranger, and, on the other hand, he says that he is a citizen? How are we to understand this? Many different explanations are given, one of which I find extremely relevant to our lives and which I would like to share with you.

Abraham's two-word description of himself summarizes, in an odd fashion, not only his own place in society at this critical moment of his life, but also the place his children will assume in the world through the ages.

Throughout history, we Jews have maintained a delicate balance in order to survive and thrive. When given the opportunity, we have been "citizens," contributing to society by playing important roles in governance, contributing to the culture of the country and enhancing it in many other ways. At the same time, we were also "strangers." We have participated in the life of society at large, while maintaining our traditions and our belief system. Not infrequently, we have died sanctifying God's name because we chose not to accept ways that were antithetical to our beliefs.

This balance is crucial to our nation's continued existence.

Abraham our forefather, the first to face this dilemma, approaches the Hittites who want him to become part of their society. They declare him a prince among them, they offer him a free burial plot for his wife. Yet Abraham is not impressed by all of this. He knows that, if he agrees to take this land for free, he will be obliged to follow an alien way of life. This, Abraham most certainly will not do; he will not be beholden in any way whatsoever to people whose philosophies are foreign to his.

On the other hand, Abraham declares himself a citizen, ready to muster his considerable resources in order to contribute to society.

I am often asked the question, especially by students who come back from Israel after spending a year or more in yeshivot and seminaries, "Which is the real world? The yeshiva world or the world to which we've just returned?"

The answer is simple: both worlds are real. Paramount is the balance between them.

Let us all try to create a healthy balance – the "balance of Abraham," as it were – in our own lives and avoid extremes.

The versatile cauliflower

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

A strange looking kind of vegetable, the cauliflower is part of the mustard family (its cousins are cabbage, brussels sprouts, broccoli, kale and kohlrabi). It can be found in white, purple and green. The cauliflower has an earthy, mellow flavour that can be appreciated in both its raw and its cooked state.

As they say in that old commercial, most parts are edible (yes the leaves and stalks are edible), but most of us just go for the flowerets, the part known as the curd. You should look for a head that is firm and has an even colour and no black or dark soft spots. The leaves should be green and the stalks firm. You should store your cauliflower in its wrapping in the crisper section of the refrigerator and use it within a week of when you purchase it.

CHEESE AND CRUNCH CAULIFLOWER

2 heads cauliflower, washed and cut into flowerets and steamed crisp and tender
1/4 to 1/3 cup minced onions
1 stick butter or margarine
1/4 to 1/2 cup panko breadcrumbs
1 1/2 tbsp. chopped parsley
3 tbsp. Parmesan cheese
salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-in. baking dish. While the cauliflower is cooking, melt the butter in a small pan and sauté the onions for about 2 minutes. Add the breadcrumbs and cook, stirring constantly until everything is lightly golden. Remove the mixture from the heat. Season with salt and pepper.

Sprinkle a little of the breadcrumb mixture on the bottom of the greased baking dish. Drain the flowerets, pat them dry and place them on top of the breadcrumb mixture. Sprinkle the remaining breadcrumb mixture over the top. Sprinkle the top of the casserole with the parsley and Parmesan cheese. Bake for 20 minutes. Serves 6 to 8.

CREAMY CAULIFLOWER SOUP

2 heads cauliflower
juice from 1 lemon
2 tbsp. minced onion
2 celery stalks, minced
1/4 cup butter or margarine
1/4 cup flour
4 cups chicken or vegetable broth
2 cups cream or non-dairy substitute dash of nutmeg
salt to taste
grated Parmesan cheese (optional)

Wash the cauliflower and break into flowerets. Cook with the lemon juice in a small amount of boiling water until tender. Drain and whirl cauliflower in blender until pureed, or force through a food mill. Sauté the onion and celery in the butter for 2 to 3 minutes. Blend in the flour and stir in broth. Cook, stirring, until slightly thickened. Stir in the cauliflower, cream, nutmeg and salt. Garnish with cheese. Makes about 6 servings.

GIADA DE LAURENTIS PARMESAN BROCCOLI AND CAULIFLOWER SALAD

2 1/2 cups bite-sized broccoli florets
2 1/2 cups bite-sized cauliflower florets
2 eggs, lightly beaten
1 cup grated Parmesan
1/2 to 1 cup olive oil
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
4 cups lightly packed fresh spinach leaves
1/2 lemon, zested
1 lemon, juiced
1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil
salt to taste
1/2 tsp. freshly ground black pepper

Place the broccoli and cauliflower in a large bowl. Toss with the beaten eggs to coat evenly. Place the Parmesan in a large tray or baking dish and dredge the vegetables in the cheese, pressing to coat evenly.

Pour olive oil into a large, heavy skillet until the olive oil is 1/4-inch deep, about 1/2 cup depending on the size of your skillet. Warm the olive oil over medium-high heat. When the oil is hot, carefully add the Parmesan-coated vegetables. Do not overcrowd the pan. Cook in batches, if necessary. Let the vegetables cook until a crust forms, about 3 minutes per side. Turn the vegetables only when they easily release from the bottom of the pan. Drain on paper towels and season with salt.

Place the spinach in a large bowl. In a small bowl, whisk together the lemon zest, lemon juice, extra-virgin olive oil, salt and pepper. Drizzle the spinach with the vinaigrette and toss to coat. Add the Parmesan coated vegetables. Toss and serve. Serves 8. Recipe from Giada De Laurentiis.

Students get crash course about political life in Ottawa

Harrison Jordan
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

It was another normal day in Ottawa. They punched the snooze bar at 6:30 a.m., suited up in their finest business attire, and walked up the steep steps to Parliament for back-to-back meetings with cabinet ministers, opposition members and even party leaders.

The daily life of a politician might seem long and arduous, but for more than three dozen of Canada's youngest political junkies, a weeklong crash-course in Ottawa's political life was nothing short of exciting.

The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's (CJPAC) Fellowship Conference in November brought together 38 multi-partisan post-secondary students from across Canada.

They had come not only to strengthen their own political understanding but also to bring back to their campuses the skills and resources to engage their peers in the political process.

"There really isn't any program similar to this in the entire country," says Mark Waldman, CJPAC's executive director.

"The students will go back to their campuses among an elite few who have the skills, training and networks to truly excel in Canadian political life."

Next semester, every fellow is expected to hold an event on their respective campus to introduce their peers and community members into the political process.

They will draw on the expertise acquired during the conference, and CJPAC staff will provide guidance for the fellows during the organization and promotion of each event.

What began as a small delegation in 2005 with a handful of participants has now grown into a prestigious annual conference that politicians are eager to participate in.

The program is now more diverse than ever, with student representation from all sides of the political spectrum and an increasing contingent of female participants.

Almost one-third of this year's fellows come from non-Jewish backgrounds. The fellows are united in their belief in the importance of ensuring that Jewish and pro-Israel issues remain political issues for all Canadians.

Aside from meeting politicians and traversing Parliament Hill, participants also heard from many behind-the-scenes, "war room" players from the last federal election and key figures in Canada-Israel relations.

There were even visits from fellowship alumni who now work on Parliament Hill, participating directly in Canada's most important democratic institutions.

One of the exercises had the fellows split up into groups to participate in an election campaign simulation.

Each group developed a campaign plan for a mock election. Their plans were presented on the last day of the conference, and CJPAC staff crowned a winning team based on the integration of the skills the students had acquired during the conference.

Some groups went all out – creating fake websites and Twitter feeds to boost their virtual candidate.

"The fellowship is a completely unique opportunity for young Jewish and pro-Israel political activists to build lifelong friendships and partnerships," said Emile Scheffel, a fellowship co-chair.

"The program is also a huge benefit to Canada's political parties, in that it provides them with a talented and dedicated pool of volunteers, staff and future leaders."

"There's a joke in Ottawa, that kids run Parliament," says Eleanor Johnston, the CJPAC director who co-ordinates the fellowship.

"That's the goal of the CJPAC Fellowship – to show young Jews across the nation that they can get engaged and change the world."

Harrison Jordan is a student at the University of Guelph and a first-year CJPAC fellow.

תודה לאילנה מילמן על הקטע הבא:
הסופר אמנון שמוש, חבר קיבוץ מעיין ברוך , המוכר לרבים מספריו המצויינים ("מישל עזרא ספרא ובניו") תיאר בשפתו המיוחדת את הימים של ההווה:

" במאה הזאת
אין גרעינים באבטיח,
אין תאי טלפון ברחובות,
אין שוויון בקיבוצים
ואין אידיאולוגיה בפוליטיקה.

במאה הזאת
שר בלי תיק הוא מעמד נדיר ומכובד,
בית הבראה נקרא צימר,
בית אבות נקרא אחוזה
ובית בושת- הממשלה.

במאה הזאת
כבר לא שותים גזוז, צוף,מיץ פז ומי ברז,
שוטים מנהיגים את המדינה שלנו, ועוד כמה מדינות,
מאירן ועד בורמה, מהדו ועד בוש.

במאה הזאת
מיליונים נהרגים במלחמות ומתים ברעב וממחלות,
אלא שהמעם הכל מצלם ומתוקשר, מסודר ומשודר.
הנכדים מלמדים אותנו להשתמש במחשב ובשאר אביזרי האלף השלישי.
הייתי רוצה להרגיש בבית....
ואינני יכול".

סרטים שכדאי-חלק ב'

עוד סרט ששווה מאוד להקדיש לו שעתיים בפגרת סוף השנה: "האַרטיסט" הוא סרט צרפתי רב עוצמה שעשוי בשחור לבן ולא בכדי: הוא מתאר את שנות העשרים של המאה שעברה, כאשר הסרטים היו אילמים. זהו סיפורו של כוכב ענק של דור הסרטים האילמים שמסרב להסתגל למהפיכת הסאונד ואיננו משכים שיהיה סאונד בסרטים שלו- וכך הוא מוצא את עצמו מחוץ לביזנס, מחוץ לחיים, וחייו הולכים להסתיים בעוני ודלות ובלא כלום. אלא שלצידו מופיעה שחקנית צעירה ומקסימה שהוא מירגן לה בימי הסרט האילם, ושהמכה ביניהם לכוכבת העל של הסרט המדבר, והיא מחזירה אותו לחיים. למותר לציין שהסרט כולו עשוי בשחור לבן, והוא, מתחילתו ועד סופו- סרט אילם!

זה החזיר אותי לסרט ה"אַרטיסט" ומה קורה למי שאיננו מצליח להסתגל לשינויים המהירים שסובבים אותנו.

GREETING CHANUKAH

Senior kindergarten students from Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns branch on Neptune Drive danced and sang on Dec. 20 for their neighbours at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community. Residents of the Baycrest condominium joined with the lively young entertainers in singing traditional Chanukah songs and enjoyed the ceremonial lighting of the holiday's first candle.

GETTING READY

HOLIDAY FUN

Before the start of Chanukah, students at the Joe Dwek Ohr Haemet Sephardic School celebrated the holiday with various activities and events, including the school's annual Chanukah carnival. Pictured trying to pin the candle on the menorah is Marcus Cohen.

De-stressing the lives of women

Holistic nutritionist pens new book

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Rosalie Moscoe's goal is to de-stress and de-frazzle the lives of women.

A registered holistic nutritionist, Moscoe, 66, is the author of Frazzled Hurried Women, Your Stress Relief Guide to Thriving... Not Merely Surviving.

Moscoe, who has given about 800 talks on the subject, said that women who work full-time jobs, raise children, and do daily household chores, juggle more tasks at a faster pace than ever before.

Her book is a guide, she said, with easy-to-follow solutions for these busy women. "If you are overtired, overstressed, overwhelmed, over-worried, overeating or just plain overdoing it, there are practical, stress-relieving strategies in this book that can help you."

Moscoe was a children's singer and performer – she sang with the duo Jim and Rosalie and then solo – and said that her own life was stressed when she was busy being a daughter, wife and mother – she is now also a grandmother – on top of working.

"My mother died in 1986, but I didn't change my life until three years later, when I had a medical scare and a family member developed a mental illness. That is when I decided to get my family member and myself well.

"Leaving the music business was difficult, but I went on to study wellness, health promotion and holistic nutrition. Helping people became my passion."

Rosalie Moscoe

She advocates therapeutic nutrition to prevent illness, she said. "If you eat better and look after your well-being, your mental and physical health will improve. You need to eat well to reduce stress. Wellness and stress relief go hand in hand."

She spent about five years writing the book, "but it was in my head for about 15 years. I tried to make it fun and poignant."

Each chapter begins with a cartoon that sums up the chapter. Overcommitment and Stress begins with a woman holding a baby while using her computer, cooking and holding her husband's hand.

"The frazzled woman, the one who copes with repetitive stress, looks tense and tired, Moscoe said. "She can't focus too long on any one conversation, often thinking other thoughts while you talk to her."

Moscoe said that first of all, you must have a commitment to yourself. Make a list, "and decide which commitments you can drop. This is not about abandoning responsibilities, but remembering your responsibility to your own needs. Adrenal fatigue can make you tired and run down."

You have to help others, she said, "but you have to take a step back and relax. Sometimes you have to say no."

She feels for women, she said. "In my book, I'm bringing them some ideas about how to be who they want to be."

Company takes the pain out of standing in line

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Is there anything more annoying than standing in line for one, two or three hours to transact business that takes just a few minutes to conclude?

Jay Kimel-Fleishman

If you think queuing up is a complete waste of time, Jay Kimel-Fleishman is the guy to see. Founder of File My Tickets, he offers stressed-out and time-strapped individuals an easy way to avoid the lines. For a fee, his company will stand in line for you at government offices and request a trial date to fight parking and traffic tickets.

At $12 for a traffic ticket, $7 for a parking violation – there are discounts for multiple tickets – File My Tickets handles from 750 to 1,000 tickets a month. Business has really picked up since September, and "it's just growing. Everyone gets tickets, unfortunately," Kimel-Fleishman said.

"We help people set the date," he said.

So far, the business is proving to be profitable and he's hired eight people to work for him, full time and part time, either in the office or in line.

It's not his first business. "I grew up in the family business" handling national accounts for City Water International, a provider of point-of-use water filtration systems.

Kimel-Fleishman, 33, came up with the idea for the company as a result of personal experience. "I got a lot of tickets when I was younger," he said. "I always wanted an opportunity to fight them."

He learned time and again that appearing in court to set a trial date was a real pain. You missed work, lost income and sometimes even got another parking ticket while waiting in line.

Looking at the faces of others waiting their turn, "I thought they'd rather be someplace else, like at work."

But the fear of a conviction, demerit points and possible loss of licence or insurance was motivating them, he concluded.

"It's a huge waste of time," he said, but with the prevalence of the Internet and all kinds of online services, he wondered why government officials weren't offering something to make the process easier.

Could it be that making it easier wasn't on their agenda? "They don't want to encourage something that would cost them money," he suggested.

"I thought, if they [the ministry] won't do it, I will."

Kimel-Fleishman set up the web service at www.filemytickets.com and, mostly through word of mouth and some advertising, clients started to sign up. A small number were fighting parking tickets, the vast majority were ready to head to court to plead not guilty to traffic offences.

What the service offers is a warm body to stand in line for you and file a Notice of Intention to Appear, the legal document that tells the Ontario court system you intend to fight the traffic or parking violation.

File My Tickets won't actually fight the ticket for you; it merely offers clients the convenience of doing the time-consuming legwork for them.

"We're just processors," Kimel-Fleishman said.

With the arrival of the new year, File My Tickets is planning to add several new services. In addition to setting court dates for clients, it will change court dates, search records to determine if a driver was suspended, go to government offices and pay fees to reinstate licences that were suspended for non-payment of fines, file change of address notices, pick up disclosure documents and order transcripts of court proceedings.

Kimel-Fleishman expects fees to range from $15 to $20 per service, although "our bread and butter is definitely setting trials. But people will really appreciate these services."

JEWISH FEDERATION

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

DIRECTOR, FEDERATION ANNUAL CAMPAIGN

Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver builds strong, vibrant and enduring Jewish communities locally, in Israel and overseas. We are the planning, allocating and fundraising body for 35 beneficiary agencies that provide humanitarian, social, and educational services. With our community partners, Jewish Federation enriches Jewish lives, advocates for those most vulnerable and builds community from generation to generation.

To meet the demands of our growing Jewish community, we proudly raised $7.8 million through our last Annual Campaign, and we now seek an experienced fundraising professional to join our Financial Resource Development team. Familiarity with the Jewish community is an asset, but your dedication to team-building is a must.

The Director, Federation Annual Campaign is responsible for all management and administrative aspects of the fundraising campaign, and provides leadership to the Campaign department. The successful candidate will have a Bachelor's or Master's degree in non-profit management, business or related areas, with five to seven years experience in fundraising and volunteer management. Essential responsibilities include, but are not limited to, development of the Annual Campaign plan, recruitment and training of Annual Campaign leadership and volunteers, and development and implementation of strategies to identify and engage new donors.

For a full job description, please visit jewishvancouver.com/careers.

TO APPLY: Please email your resume with cover letter to carin.maher@jewishfederations.org by February 17, 2012. Only short-listed applicants will be contacted.

Israel increases defence budget

Zvi Zrahiya
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Knesset finance committee recently made a hurried decision to increase the defence budget by NIS 779 million ($210 million), despite the many calls by the Finance Ministry and the Trajtenberg committee to cut the defence budget instead.

The proposal to increase the budget – to a total of NIS 60.7 billion ($16.4 billion) – came at the end of the finance committee's meeting and was approved within minutes, without an intensive discussion.

Committee members were not told precisely how the money would be used. Instead, the details will be passed to a joint committee composed of Knesset finance, foreign affairs and defence committee members.

The Trajtenberg committee, appointed in the wake of last summer's cost of living protests, had called for cutting the defence budget in order to fund more social programs. A three per cent cut to the defence budget had been discussed.

Sources say the budget increase was most likely approved at the beginning of the year as part of an agreement between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the Finance Ministry and the Defence Ministry. Economic leaders argued the deal had been hashed out between Netanyahu and his close associate Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who has been pushing for a budget increase.

Increasing the defence budget comes at the expense of the welfare budget, which is losing NIS 70 million ($18.9 million); the National Insurance Institute, which loses NIS 113 million ($30.5 million); the Housing Ministry, which loses NIS 24 million ($6.5 million); as well as other government ministries and budgets. Also going under the knife are funds to assist demobilized soldiers and the Environmental Defence Ministry.

Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz said the budget increase was merely a technical matter. Knesset finance committee chair Moshe Gafni was among those voting in favour.

Knesset members from the Kadima, Labor and National Union parties voted against the budget increase.

MK Shai Hermesh (Kadima) slammed the move for coming at a time when talks were underway to cut the defence budget. "This is a slap in the face to anyone who wants transparency," Hermesh said, noting the committee had recently met twice with Barak and demanded that the defence budget become more transparent.

Gafni tried to calm Knesset members by stating that the increase related to money that hadn't been used by other ministries.

The Defence Ministry stated in response that it was not receiving any money beyond what was called for in the 2011 budget, which the government approved.

Segregation in Beit Shemesh causes uproar

Mary Oster
JTA

JERUSALEM — Beit Shemesh in central Israel has been the site of on-again, off-again religious violence for several years.

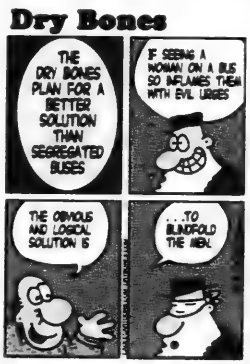
But it wasn't until the plight of a fearful eight-year-old girl from a modern Orthodox immigrant family from America was broadcast on Israel's Channel 2 over the weekend that the religious tensions in Beit Shemesh captured the nation's attention, including that of Israel's prime minister and its president.

In the broadcast, the girl, Na'ama Margolis, told a reporter that she is afraid to walk the 300 yards from her home to her modern Orthodox girls' school for fear that the haredi men who protest outside of the school will hurt her. Video showed Na'ama's mother encouraging her to walk the short way to school punctuated by the girl's whimpers and cries of "no, no."

Some haredi residents of Beit Shemesh, which has a population of about 80,000, are upset about the opening last September of a modern Orthodox girls' school, Orot, across the street from their neighbourhood. Confrontations between haredi activists and modern Orthodox concerning the school have waxed and waned since the beginning of the school year, and often resulted in violence.

Haredi protesters have thrown eggs and bags of excrement at the young girls and called them "sluts" and "shiksas." Haredi opponents of the school say the girls and their mothers dress immodestly, with sleeves and skirts that are not sufficiently long.

After the story aired over the weekend, the dispute in Beit Shemesh became national news and the violence ratcheted up a notch.



Dry Bones
THE DRY BONES PLAN FOR A BETTER SOLUTION THAN SEGREGATED BUSES
IF SEEING A WOMAN ON A BUS SO INFLAMES THEM WITH EVIL URGES THE OBVIOUS AND LOGICAL SOLUTION IS ...TO BLINDFOLD THE MEN.

On Dec. 25, haredi rioters surrounded and threw stones at city workers removing signs calling for the separation of the sexes on city streets. When haredi activists put up new signs to replace them, the police who returned the next day to remove them encountered rioting by about 300 haredi men who threw stones at police and burned trash cans, according to Ha'aretz.

Fisticuffs also broke out when news teams from two Israeli television channels were attacked by haredi extremists when they attempted to film in the city.

On the evening of Dec. 27, some 2,000 defenders of the girls – secular and modern Orthodox – struck back with a rally at the school against attempts to exclude women from the public sphere in Israel.

Israeli President Shimon Peres urged Israelis to attend the rally. "Today is a test for the nation, not just for the police. All of us, religious, secular, traditional must as one man defend the character of the State of Israel against a minority which breaks our national solidarity," Peres told reporters.

"Free Israel from religious coercion" read one sign at the rally. "Stop Israel from becoming Iran" read another.

"We are struggling over Israel's character not only in Beit Shemesh, and not only over the exclusion of women, but against all the extremists who have come out of the woodwork to try and impose their worldview on us," opposition leader Tzipi Livni, head of the Kadima party, said at the rally.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called on the Israeli Police to act aggressively against violence aimed at women. Netanyahu also reportedly spoke with Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein to make certain that laws against excluding women from public spaces are enforced.

"The exclusion of women goes against the tradition of the Bible and the principles of Judaism," Netanyahu told participants at a Bible contest on Dec. 27.

Kadima lawmaker Nachman Shai submitted a bill to the Knesset on Dec. 29 that would make "publicizing, inciting, preaching or encouraging gender segregation in the public sphere" a criminal act punishable by three years in prison.

The haredi Orthodox mayor of Beit Shemesh, Moshe Abutbul, decried the violence against young girls and the exclusion of women.

Following the violence, the Beit Shemesh municipality said it would install hundreds of security cameras in areas where harassment of women was occurring.

In related developments, a haredi man who insulted a female soldier after she refused to sit in the back of a city bus was charged on Dec. 29 with sexual harassment. Moshe Fuchs, 44, was indicted in a Jerusalem court, a day after he was arrested by Jerusalem police for calling the soldier, Doron Matalon, 19, a "whore" and a "shiksa" on a Jerusalem bus. Other passengers on the bus joined him in insulting Matalon. The bus driver pulled over and called police.

Canadian and American Jewish groups condemned the public violence against women in Israel.

"We deplore that there are those who are perverting Jewish tradition in this way and, at the same time, are gratified at those in Israel who are reaffirming the need for respect for everyone as individuals regardless of gender or orientation," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Public Affairs.

Fogel added that he believes Netanyahu's remarks also reflect the feelings of the Canadian Jewish community.

Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, said in a statement that it stands firmly against discrimination with regard to gender, religion and race.

"We denounce recent attempts by extremists to segregate and discriminate against women in public spaces in Israel," the organization said. "All of our institutions… are fully committed to equal opportunity for all."

Hadassah praised Netanyahu and Israeli President Shimon Peres "for their public statements and [called] on religious and political leaders everywhere to join them in condemning and committing to end extremist positions against women."

The Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) also praised Netanyahu and members of the government for their public condemnations of religious extremism and violence against women.

"Our movement includes Jewish people from all streams and persuasions. Yet, despite our differing backgrounds, we unite today to strongly condemn, with one clear and loud voice, all acts of violence, intimidation, coercion and extremism, especially those that are undertaken, incredibly, in the name of Judaism," said Jerry Silverman, president and CEO of JFNA. "We know that 'derachehah darchei noam' – the Torah's paths are ways of peace. We stand firmly and resolutely behind the voices of reason and moderation in Beit Shemesh and throughout Israel."

Haredim seek media's help to be rid of extremists

Yair Ettinger
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — One after the other, the haredim approached the reporters. Some gave their full names, some refused to give any name or – as with one leading rabbi – asked that their names not be published. Some came forward in the streets of Beit Shemesh, some made a phone call.

They are reaching out to plead for the help of journalists working for secular newspapers, which many haredim now think will play a decisive role in increasing public pressure on the extremists living in Beit Shemesh and Jerusalem.

They want the police and the government to get on the extremists' case, because the leadership vacuum created by politicians, rabbis and newspapers that serve the haredi world has left mainstream haredim looking for help in places they normally wouldn't go.

Changes are afoot even within the haredi media. True, the haredi Yated Ne'eman newspaper warned in its lead headline on Dec. 26 of an "incitement campaign" against haredim, which it said was aimed at breaking up the coalition alliance between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the haredi political parties, as well as putting a damper on the goal of making more Jews Torah-observant. But several writers for haredi websites are consistently and vigorously attacking the extremists – and even declaring them to be enemies of the haredim.

"This is the time to create a barrier between us and the extremists," said Aryeh Goldhaber, an activist in the Tov movement, which represents moderate haredim on the Beit Shemesh and Betar Ilit city councils. "People, even among the secular population, are beginning to realize that those who are going wild in Beit Shemesh are a crazy, extremist group spreading fear through the streets, beating people, vandalizing, using violence. The public is afraid of them, the rabbis are afraid of them. This has to stop."

Tov representatives, who paid a visit to the home of Na'ama Margolese, an eight-year-old girl who was spat upon by haredim protesting the "immodesty" of religious schoolgirls on their way to class, see themselves as an alternative to the haredi parties United Torah Judaism and Shas. In addition to seeking a crackdown on the extremists, Tov also wants to develop a different model for haredim, Goldhaber said.

For instance, though many haredi men refuse to work for a living, Goldhaber does, and he is trying to foster a larger group of haredim who both work and learn Torah. He helped found a haraedi yeshiva, Metivta Beit Shemesh, one of the few haredi yeshivot in Israel where high school students take the bagrut, the official Israeli matriculation exams.

He says haredim like him fall between the cracks. "Instead of helping us, the establishment ignores us or makes it hard for us," Goldhaber said.

The Beit Shemesh municipality did not allocate land for the yeshiva, forcing the founders to solicit donations from the parents of prospective students and rent a building. Goldhaber said the Education Ministry does not officially recognize the yeshiva and that it has faced many bureaucratic obstacles.

"The more support we get from the outside, the more effective we will be able to be," he said. "But if we aren't granted legitimacy, both from the public at large and from the ultra-Orthodox population, if we don't manage to establish more normal yeshivas where you can take the bagrut, then we're on the sure path to civil war."

Another area resident, a chassidic man who lives in Ramat Beit Shemesh, called on the police to take action against the extremists.

"The police have to crack down on them," he said. "They're violent, they threaten us, they're strangling us and their own rabbis. They don't let anyone live."

The man said his wife quit what he said was her "kosher" job, for which she studied at a haredi institute for professional training, because extremists warned them they would put up flyers condemning them if she didn't.

"Their rabbis don't dare say a word to them," the man said. "I think that the ones responsible for excluding women here are the state, the police – for not doing anything about them."

Marriage bill passes first reading

JTA

JERUSALEM — A bill that would allow couples wishing to marry to register with any rabbinate in the country passed a preliminary Knesset reading.

The bill was approved 57 to 15, and was opposed by the religious Shas and United Torah Judaism parties, which voted against the legislation. The bill was initiated by the Yisrael Beiteinu party. It must still pass second and third readings in the Knesset.

Currently, Jewish couples must register with the rabbinate in the city or region of residence of one member of the couple.

The legislation comes more than a month after Tzohar, an organization of modern Orthodox rabbis that performs alternative religious wedding ceremonies for non-religious couples, was given approval to register couples in the community of Shoham, where the head of the organization serves as chief rabbi.

A Jewish couple must have a religious ceremony in Israel in order to be recognized as married. Many travel abroad to marry in secular ceremonies.

The new law also would be a boon to converts to Judaism, especially those who convert through the Israel Defence Forces, according to Ha'aretz, who will be able to register to marry with more moderate Orthodox rabbis who recognize their conversions.

Israel's population 7.8 million

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's population stands at 7.836 million people, the Central Bureau of Statistics (ICBS) indicated last Thursday in its year-end survey.

According to the ICBS report, Jews comprise 75.3 per cent of the country's population, with 5.901 million people. Arab citizens comprise 20.5 per cent, or 1.610 million. Another 4.2 per cent of Israel's population, some 325,000 people, are non-Arab Christians and those whom the Interior Ministry doesn't classify by religion.

The survey also indicated that 2011 saw a 1.8 per cent increase in Israel's population – 141,000 people – a rate comparable to the figures of the last decade. In Israel, 166,800 babies were born during the year, and about 17,500 new immigrants arrived in the country.

Iran threatens to cut off world oil supply

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States is in no position to advise Iran against cutting global oil supply in case of sanctions against its petroleum industry, a top Iranian commander said last Thursday.

The comment by deputy chief of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Hossein Salami came after the U.S. Fifth Fleet said it will not allow any disruption of traffic in the Strait of Hormuz, a crucial waterway in the distribution of worldwide oil supply.

"The free flow of goods and services through the Strait of Hormuz is vital to regional and global prosperity," the U.S. Navy said in a written response to queries from Reuters about the possibility of Iran trying to close the strait.

Responding to the remark by U.S. forces, Salami told Iranian state television Press TV that the "Islamic Republic of Iran asks for no other country's permission for the implementation of its defense strategies."

According to the Press TV report, the senior Iranian military official also said that U.S. pressure had failed to prevent Iranian action on other issues in the past.

Hossein Salami

The U.S. Navy's comments came a day after Iran's first vice-president warned that the flow of crude will be stopped from the crucial Strait of Hormuz in the Gulf if foreign sanctions are imposed on its oil exports, the country's official news agency reported. "If they [the West] impose sanctions on Iran's oil exports, then even one drop of oil cannot flow from the Strait of Hormuz," IRNA quoted Mohammad Reza Rahimi as saying.

About one-third of all seaborne oil was shipped through the strait in 2009, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration, and U.S. warships patrol the area to ensure safe passage.

Tensions over Iran's nuclear program have increased since the International Atomic Energy Agency reported on Nov. 8 that Tehran appears to have worked on designing a nuclear bomb and may still be pursuing research to that end. Iran strongly denies this and says it is developing nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

Iran has warned it will respond to any attack by hitting Israel and U.S. interests in the Gulf, and analysts say one way to retaliate would be to close the Strait of Hormuz.

Most of the crude exported from Saudi Arabia, Iran, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait and Iraq – together with nearly all the liquefied natural gas from lead exporter Qatar – must pass through a 6.4-kilometre-wide shipping channel between Oman and Iran.

Clay seal discovered

JTA

JERUSALEM — A tiny clay seal that likely certified the purity of ritual objects used in the Second Temple was discovered in an excavation near the Temple Mount. The seal, which may have been used on the cruse of oil that lit the Temple's menorah after the victory of the Maccabees over the Greeks, is the first "direct archeological evidence of activity on the Temple Mount and the workings of the Temple during the Second Temple period," according to the Israel Antiquities Authority, which announced last month.

The seal, which is about two centimetres in diameter, or the size of a button, was discovered during a sieving process of the soil removed from the excavation. It is stamped with a two-line Aramaic inscription.

"The meaning of the inscription is 'Pure for God,'" according to the excavation directors on behalf of the Israel Antiquities Authority, archeologists Eli Shukron of the IAA and Prof. Ronny Reich of the University of Haifa. "It seems that the inscribed object was used to mark products or objects that were brought to the Temple, and it was imperative they be ritually pure. This stamped impression is probably the kind referred to in the Mishnah as a chotem, or seal."

The artifact was discovered among the layers of soil covering the foundations of the Western Wall, about 15 metres north of the southwestern corner of the Temple Mount, excavated beneath Robinson's Arch.

This tiny seal could have been used as a "voucher" certifying the ritual purity of an object or food in the Temple Mount compound and in the Second Temple.

Other artifacts dating to the Second Temple period were discovered, including some that date earlier to the time of the Hasmoneans, such as oil lamps, ceramic cooking pots and a fusiform juglet that may have contained oils and perfume, as well as coins of the Hasmonean kings, such as Alexander Jannaeus and John Hyrcanus.

Germany adds compensation benefits to some Soviet cases

JTA

NEW YORK — Germany has agreed to changes in one of its restitution programs that will add payouts of approximately $3,300 to some 10,000 Jews, the Claims Conference announced.

The changes, which will affect the hardship fund, will expand the class of World War II survivors eligible for one-time payouts to include those who fled Soviet areas between June 22, 1941, and Jan. 27, 1944, that were never occupied by the Nazis, but were within about 62 miles of the Nazi line.

Until now, only survivors from areas that were eventually occupied by the Nazis were eligible. The new rules, which were to go into effect Jan. 1, recognize that even if their cities never fell to the Nazis, the Jews' flight from them under the threat of Nazi occupation constitutes hardship caused by Nazi Germany.

"We are gratified to be able to attain recognition for these now-elderly Jews who suffered," Gregory Schneider, the executive vice-president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, told JTA. "Jews who lay in the path of the Nazi onslaught had every reason to fear they would be massacred. Having fled to avoid this fate, their experience as Jewish refugees deserves acknowledgement."

The change will expand eligibility to Jews who fled Moscow and Stalingrad –now known as Volgograd – as well as those who fled Leningrad prior to the Nazi siege of the city. However, the payouts are open only to those who have since moved to the West. Those currently living in former Soviet bloc countries remain ineligible.

Other changes to the hardship fund to take effect Jan. 1 include payments to citizens of certain western European countries during the Nazi era who have not received any other payment from German sources, and payments to Jews living in former Soviet bloc countries who were born after 1927 and were orphaned as a result of the Nazis' actions.

Israel Briefs

Hadassah in debt

The Hadassah Medical Center hasn't been able to pay its suppliers, an Israeli business daily has reported. Hadassah's debt to its suppliers is reportedly about $2.65 million, according to the Calcalist, a publication of Yediot Achronot. The Hadassah Medical Center does not receive any Israeli government support, as it is owned by Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America. The Hadassah organization lost about $90 million in the Madoff Ponzi scheme. Following the Madoff affair, Hadassah cut its annual support to the hospital, according to Yediot Achronot. Hadassah told Ynet that "unlike other hospitals, Hadassah does not receive any budgeting from the government or the state health system. This is a temporary setback in a minor portion of the payments, due to the fact that Hadassah has not received all of its due payments from various parties."

Babies separated in utero

Surgeons at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem separated conjoined twins in utero. The babies shared a placenta and major blood vessels. Their lives were in danger in the womb of their 25-year-old mother, from a Palestinian village, who was in her 20th week of pregnancy. The babies' blood supply was separated using a laser device inserted in the womb.

Attackers from capital

Many of the activists who vandalized an army base in the West Bank two weeks ago came from a yeshiva in Jerusalem, police told Israeli media. Some 40 of the activists arrived near the West Bank outpost of Ramat Gilad on a chartered bus from the Mercaz Harav Yeshiva in Jerusalem. The arrangements reportedly were co-ordinated by three Mercaz Harav students from the West Bank currently residing in Jerusalem after being banned from the West Bank by the Israel Defence Forces. The organizers reportedly planned the attack on the Ephraim army base in advance, using maps and intelligence on troop movements that they had collected, according to Ynet.

Convoy Attacked

Israel's air force allegedly attacked weapons convoys travelling from Sudan to the Gaza Strip, Sudanese media reported. The two convoys reportedly were smuggling Iranian weapons to Gaza earlier this month when they were hit by warplanes. At least two people were killed and several wounded in the strikes, according to the reports. Israel has not responded to the reports, which have been denied by the Sudanese army. Sudan's foreign minister in April blamed Israel for a bombing attack on a car near the country's port city, Port Sudan, which killed two.

U.S. worried about treaty

Israeli media reported that according to Egyptian opposition figure Mohamed El-Baradei, the United States is secretly talking with Egypt's ruling military council to ensure that the country's democratically elected regime will maintain its peace treaty with Israel. Islamist parties have won the first two rounds of the elections. Recent reports have been contradictory and confusing regarding the intention of the Islamist parties to honour Egypt's peace treaty with Israel.

International orchestra's common language is music

Kathryn Kates
Special to the CJN

The International Chamber Soloists are truly international, coming from Australia, Brazil, Belarus, Bulgaria, Latvia, Lithuania, New Zealand, Poland, Russia, Taiwan and the United States.

"We come from many different backgrounds, but through the music we find a common language," says the renowned violinist Dmitri Berlinsky, the group's founder.

Berlinsky brings his orchestra to Toronto's Walter Hall in the new year, as part of the Mooredale Concerts.

Originally from St. Petersburg, Russia, Berlinsky immigrated to the United States in 1990. In 2004, he founded the International Chamber Soloists at the Michigan State University, where he is on the faculty.

The group has evolved from his most extraordinary young string students and members of the MSU faculty to include a professional ensemble, boasting members of major orchestras as well as advanced players from other leading music schools.

Berlinsky himself has won several violin competitions, including the Paganini Competiton in Italy and the Montreal International Violin Competition.

Since Berlinsky toured as a soloist for many years, the idea of forming the International Chamber Soloists appealed to him. Berlinsky says he was inspired by other chamber orchestras from his homeland, including Vladimir Spivakov's Moscow's Virtuosi.

Dmitri Berlinsky performs in St. Petersburg, Russia.

"When I heard these wonderful chamber orchestras, it wasn't just a bunch of musicians, but they were all accomplished players on their own," says Berlinsky. "The way they played was something really spectacular. I had always wanted to do this since I was young, but it took a long time.

"I played at a festival in Costa Rica a couple of times with another chamber orchestra from Sweden, in which I had to work without a conductor, so when the music director saw me working, he suggested that I bring my own group in a year or so. It took two years to create the group, and one of our first tours was to Central America," he says.

Berlinsky has performed in Toronto before, with the Toronto Symphony Chamber Orchestra.

For their Toronto debut, the International Chamber Soloists will perform Mendelssohn's youthful Concerto for Violin and String Orchestra in D Minor, with Berlinsky as soloist.

"It is not Mendelssohn's most famous, but it is a wonderful piece, written when he was 13 years old or even younger. He was a child prodigy, a genius. You can hear some Mozart influence in his music," says Berlinsky.

The first half of the concert concludes with two of Argentine composer Astor Piazzolla's famed tango-inflected works, Four Seasons of Buenos Aires – Verano Porteno (Summer) and Primavera Porteno (Spring). Berlinsky says it is one of the greatest pieces originally written for a string sextet.

After intermission, audiences will be treated to Tchaikovsky's String Sextet in D Minor, Op. 70 (Souvenir de Florence), with its Russian folk-like melodies in the last two movements.

In addition, Berlinsky and the International Chamber Soloists will perform a one-hour, interactive version of their concert for children, Music & Truffles, before the main performance. The series is designed to awaken love and appreciation of classical music in children five to 15. Adults wishing to learn more about music and music-making are also welcome. This concert culminates with a chocolate truffle for all.

The International Chamber Soloists perform at Walter Hall at the University of Toronto Faculty of Music, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park, on Jan. 15, 2012, at 3:15 p.m. The concert for children, Music & Truffles, starts at 1:15 p.m. Tickets at www.mooredaleconcerts.com or by calling 416-922-3714, ext. 103. www.InternationalChamberSoloists.com.

Bikel returns to Toronto stage

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Legendary actor Theodore Bikel will grace the stage of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company (HGJTC) once again, this time in the Toronto premiere of Jeff Baron's Visiting Mr. Green, at the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, starting Jan. 28.

In 2009, he starred in Sholom Aleichem: Laughter Through Tears, for which he won a 2010 Drama Desk Award for outstanding solo performance.

Visiting Mr. Green is one of the most-produced plays in the world, boasting more than 300 productions around the world, and it's been translated into 22 languages. Jen Shuber directs this production.

"Eli Wallach did it off-Broadway and on tour," says Bikel, who comes to the role of Mr. Green for the first time. "I'm drawn to the play, because it has an intimate setting and it's not diffuse. It doesn't go off in 20 different directions. It concentrates on the relationship between two human beings who start out quite disparate from each other to the extent that they have nothing in common and will find nothing in common. At the end of the play, you realize that each of them fulfils a need in the other."

The younger man is forced by a court order to visit the older man as punishment because he almost hit the older man with his car.

Play examines Middle East conflict

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

How can Israelis and Palestinians live in harmony? What land belongs to whom? What is it like being an Israeli in the Holy Land?

These are some of the heady questions explored in A Tiny Piece of Land, presented by Teatron Theatre and running at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts until Jan. 15.

This modern American play tells the story of two brothers with opposite worldviews: Yossi (Geoff Kolomayz) ended up moving to Israel and embraced Zionism, while Barry (Bob Legare) is a typical middle-class American Jew who wants nothing to do with Israel. The play explores the tense family dynamics arising from the brothers butting heads over who's right and who's misguided.

"The beauty is that it's not really a political play, but a family play," says Ari Weisberg, artistic director of Teatron Theatre. The writers, Joni Browne-Walders and husband Mel Weiser, not only wanted to show both sides of the Middle East conflict, but also explore the relationships of a family divided by their entrenched beliefs.

Still, Weisberg points out, "you can't be a Jew in Israel without having an opinion on politics," and A Tiny Piece of Land frames the brothers' arguments in a way that lets audience members make their own decisions on this thought-provoking issue.

The production, directed and set-designed by Weisberg, also stars local actors Tara Nicodemo, and Nicole Marie McCafferty.

Theatre aficionados will also hear echoes of another Middle East play on this stage: Weisberg says the writers were influenced by My Name is Rachel, the controversial play about activist Rachel Corrie, who died while protesting the demolition of a Palestinian home by Israeli military bulldozers. The writers have said they wanted to create a response to the play showing Israel's point of view.

In a 2010 interview, Browne-Walders said that other Israeli issues also inspired the play. "We discussed the pullout from the Gush Katif [Gaza] in August 2005. The government forced the settlers out to let Palestinians move in, but the Palestinians have since used the land to shoot rockets into Israel. They've destroyed everything there, even though they were living there. Why? Because the Israelis had used it."

A Tiny Piece of Land doesn't just focus on serious topics. It also includes flashes of humour, and Weisberg believes the play isn't so heavy that young adults won't enjoy it. "I want the audience to be left with a deeper understanding of the family challenges in Israel," he adds.

A Tiny Piece of Land follows Teatron's 2011 run of political plays, such as Deceived, the story of American-Jewish spy Jonathan Pollard. Teatron plans to go a bit lighter in 2012, staging the comedy Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke? in March. Weisberg says Teatron is also considering staging a production of Chaim Potok's My Name is Asher Lev at some point in 2012.

Bob Legare as Barry and Nicole Marie McCafferty as Rachel in A Tiny Piece of Land

A Tiny Piece of Land runs at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts from Jan.4 to Jan. 15. For tickets, visit www.teatrontheatre.com.

Bikel best known for his role as Tevye

"The old man was shaken up, but remembers very little of this accident. He wasn't hospitalized or really hurt in a major way. The young man is ordered to come once a week and help, but the old man doesn't want his help... His wife passed away recently and he's a loner," Bikel says.

The two-man play also stars actor Aidan deSalaiz, a veteran of the Stratford Festival. The two starred together in a musical version of the Ted Allen play Lies My Father Told Me at the Segal Centre for the Performing Arts in Montreal last May.

It was no coincidence that they're working together again, as Bikel strongly recommended deSalaiz for this production.

"He was magnificent in Lies My Father Told Me. He never left the stage throughout the play," says Bikel. "He was present at all times, but almost disappeared into the scenery when he needed not to draw attention to the character. It was an extraordinary feat that he accomplished in that play."

Theodore Bikel

The California-based actor says that he hopes the audience gets not only what is obvious on the stage, but also the subtext of the characters.

"If you're lucky enough, the audience gets it. As in life, what is actually said is only part of the story. In any conversation, we ask ourselves, 'Why did this person say that in the manner in which they said it?' Is there an agenda beyond what was actually expressed in words? If people watch a good film, it's not what the characters say, but in their face, their eyes and the attitude. On stage, it's a little more difficult to express. The characters eyes and expressions can't really be seen beyond the second row of the audience. And yet, good theatre does precisely that."

Bikel was nominated for an Academy Award for The Defiant Ones and for a Tony Award for originating the role of Captain Von Trapp in The Sound of Music, but he's best known for playing Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof, performing it more than 2,100 times on Broadway.

Bikel says he has worked more in Canada in the last two years than in the United States. He plans to bring the show to Montreal's Segal Centre this summer, and he's currently turning the play into a film. He was also in Montreal last summer with his folk group, Quartet Serendipity 4.

Visiting Mr. Green runs from Jan.28 to Feb. 18. For tickets, call 416-366-7723, or visit www.stlc.com. For more information, go to www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Bikel will also be appearing at a special "Broadway Shabbat", a Kabbalat Shabbat service on Jan. 20, 6 p.m. at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave. Tickets are $90 and include dinner. Call 416-932-9995, ext. 221.

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Conventional wisdom has it that the Hollywood film industry has always been a bastion of the political left, a claim that was probably perpetuated by the FBI, which as early as 1918 dispatched secret agents to Los Angeles to maintain close surveillance over suspected radicals. The notion that Hollywood was a nest of leftists was reinforced by the so-called Red Scare during the Cold War.

The fact of the matter is that Hollywood has had a longer history of conservatism than liberalism, argues movie historian Steven J. Ross in Hollywood Left and Right (Oxford University Press), a fine book that debunks this myth once and for all.

Politics has been part and parcel of Hollywood since its rise as America's movie capital.

During the silent era, Charlie Chaplin became the first major star to use movies for political ends. But in the main, actors stayed clear of politics, fearing that such activities would alienate audiences or jeopardize their careers.

Louis B. Mayer, a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer executive, had no such qualms. As Ross puts it, "Mayer was responsible for bringing the Republican party to Hollywood and Hollywood to the Republican party."

The onset of the Depression and the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt as president prompted many actors to become politically active. Yet stars who strayed too far from the mainstream were blacklisted.

Edward G. Robinson in Confessions of a Nazi Spy

The dissolution of the studio system in the late 1940s encouraged still more actors to speak their minds on a wide range of issues. But the Cold War emboldened right-wing actors.

Ross tracks the evolution of politics in Hollywood by focusing on actors and studio moguls who reflected the left/right divide. The first, second and third chapters are on Chaplin, Mayer and Edward G. Robinson, while the remaining chapters focus on George Murphy, Ronald Reagan, Harry Belafonte, Jane Fonda, Charlton Heston, Warren Beatty and Arnold Schwarzenegger.

To Ross, Chaplin – who was often mistakenly identified as Jewish – was an important figure who represented "the evolving intersection of movie stars, politics and celebrity culture."

As fascism spread its tentacles across Europe, he joined forces with Orson Welles, Robinson, Melvyn Douglas and other like-minded liberals to denounce Nazi Germany and the economic injustice at home.

Chaplin's biting feature film, The Dictator, a parody on Adolf Hitler and his regime, was almost never made because Hollywood's self-censorship board, the Production Code Administration (PCA), prohibited filmmakers from attacking or mocking foreign governments.

Indeed, the PCA tried to halt production of Warner Brothers' Confessions of a Nazi Spy, the first explicit anti-Nazi film to emerge from Hollywood.

According to Ross, Mayer – a Jew from Ukraine whose parents went to Canada before immigrating to the United States – was finely attuned to conservative political causes and passed on his knowledge to the Republicans.

"Being Jewish and coming from poverty, he felt a desperate need to be recognized as a success," he says. "What better proof could there be than being accepted by the party of the wealthy WASP establishment and then moving up in its ranks?"

When his business interests clashed with Jewish interests, Mayer always chose the former. Warner Brothers closed its office in Germany in 1934, but Mayer refused to follow suit. And on the eve of World War II, he invited 10 leading Nazi newspaper editors to his movie lot.

As he grew older, Mayer moved further to the right, coming out in support of Senator Joseph McCarthy. Imagine how miffed Mayer must have been when a liberal, Dore Schary, replaced him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Mayer's polar opposite, Robinson, was born Emanuel Goldenberg in Romania. Affected by the scourge of anti-semitism in his native land, Robinson was committed to eradicating social injustice and participated in progressive causes.

Robinson, whom Ross describes as a left liberal, issued denunciations of Nazi Germany, assisted German Jewish refugees and demanded equality for African-Americans. In response, reactionaries fired off a torrent of antisemitic letters branding him as "stinking Yiddish riff-raff."

Once one of Hollywood's best-paid performers, he paid dearly for his political beliefs after being accused of associating with Communists.

Although this accusation was patently false, Robinson's career ground to a halt. The only offers he received were minor roles, at greatly reduced pay scales. The marquee director, Cecil B. DeMille, handed him a plum role in The Ten Commandments, but three years elapsed before he was offered another major role.

In profiling Robinson and other notable figures, Ross writes with authority and panache, proving his case that conservatism has usually trumped liberalism in Hollywood.

More books

On a cold, frosty winter day, you can do no better than to curl up with captivating general-interest books.

Hemingway: A Life in Pictures (Firefly Books), by Boris Vejdovsky and Mariel Hemingway, is a treat, especially if you're an admirer of this great American novelist and short-story writer. The 350 photographs of Hemingway, culled from family albums by his granddaughter, have never been published before. The commentary is by Vejdovsky, a specialist in American literature.

Fifty Plants That Changed the Course of History (Firefly Books), by Bill Laws, is fascinating. Weaving together economic and political history, the author cogently explains what impact such plants as bamboo, coca, rubber and vanilla have had on our lives down through the ages.

If you live in this province, you don't have to travel far to feast eyes on wonderful sights. Top 100 Unusual Things to See in Ontario (Boston Mills Press), by Ron Brown, will take you to a ghost town, Canada's version of Gibraltar and the Grand Canyon, and Ontario's oldest trees, among other tempting destinations. The photographs add lustre to this volume. Similarly, Waterfalls of Ontario (Firefly Books), with photos by George Fischer and text by Mark Harris, transports a reader to heavenly places.

China is changing as you read these lines. From Mao to Market: China Reconfigured (Columbia University Press), by Robin Porter, is a blow-by-blow account of how this great nation has transformed itself in a generation.

In Allah, Liberty & Love (Random House), the Canadian Muslim writer and community bridge builder Irshad Manji reflects on the spiritual journey she has taken since the publication of her first book, The Trouble with Islam.

Food aficiondos will delight in poring over Ken Hom's Complete Chinese Cookbook (Firefly Books), which is comprehensive yet accessible. And if you savour desserts, look no further than Annie Dam's Cake Couture (Firefly Books), a lavishly illustrated compendium on modern cake design. – SK

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Movie/TV mogul Paul Bronfman did it his way

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"I wanted to be my own man," said Paul Bronfman in no uncertain terms. "My name was frankly a pain in the ass."

By virtue of his surname, he was once ironically regarded as a mere appendage of the Bronfman clan, the powerful Montreal Jewish family that amassed a fortune in the alcoholic beverage business and was a formidable force in Canada's Jewish community for decades.

"When I was much younger, people had preconceived notions about me," said Bronfman, whose late father, Edward, was one of the owners of a legendary brand, the Montreal Canadiens hockey team, which won four Stanley Cups in the 1970s.

"Perhaps they thought I was spoiled and had a sense of entitlement, none of which was true," he mused the other day in his office in a semi-industrial area in western Toronto. "My name was more of a negative than a positive when I lived in Montreal. In Toronto, it doesn't matter."

Bronfman, 54, is no longer afflicted by the "curse" of his heritage, to say the very least.

A towering figure in the Canadian film and television industry, he is chair of Comweb Group Inc., William F. White International Inc. and Pinewood Toronto Studios Inc.

Providing production services, studio facilities and specialized equipment to movie and television shoots in Canada, these companies have been instrumental in the making of such feature films as Titanic, The Incredible Hulk, Total Recall and such TV shows as Being Erica, Nikita and Heartland.

"We offer reliability, integrity, transparency and depth of production," said Bronfman. "We are Hollywood's back lot after Los Angeles and New York."

Bronfman's guiding credo has been the key to his success as an entrepreneur. "I always try to exceed expectations," he explained. "I do my best to satisfy clients. I go beyond the call of the job."

He could easily have joined his father's firm, Edper Enterprises, known today as Brookfield Asset Management, a multi-billion dollar conglomerate. But he never even considered the option. "I had no passion, or interest, in his business."

He always knew that he would have to leave Montreal to succeed in his own right. "I couldn't wait to leave," said Bronfman, who, contrarily, was a Toronto Maple Leafs fan. "I loved Toronto from the day I got here in 1977."

Something of a gadfly, he launched his career in show business while still in high school, where he met his wife, Judy, the mother of his three children and a real estate agent for the past 30 years.

An aficionada of rock 'n' roll, he and his friends played classic rock music at bar mitzvahs, sweet sixteens and weddings. In the mid-1970s, the concert promoter Donald Tarlton hired him as a "roadie" for the band April Wine.

"I schlepped equipment and cases of Coke," said Bronfman, who regularly worked 20-hour days and rarely got enough sleep. "I was 10th in a crew of ten."

After about six months of this grind, he joined another band, Supertramp, as an assistant manager, but the going was just as rough.

"I enjoyed it, but I didn't want to make a career on the road, or age prematurely," said Bronfman, whose musical tastes are reflected in bands like Rush, Pink Floyd and Led Zeppelin. "It was not a lifestyle I wanted to pursue."

Thanks to a connection with Harold Greenberg, the proprietor of Astral Bellevue Pathe, he landed a gig after arriving in Toronto. Bronfman worked at Astral, now Astral Media Inc., for a decade, first as a sound studio co-ordinator and then in executive positions.

He did all this as he studied commerce at the University of Toronto.

"I learned a lot from the picture editors at Astral. They weren't afraid to pass on their knowledge. I learned how to provide service and technical support and to make sure the customer was happy."

Paul Bronfman

These skills would prove useful.

At Astral, Bronfman met Hollywood producer and screenwriter Stephen J. Cannell, who would be his first business partner. Cannell sought a Canadian partner because he wanted to open a movie studio in Vancouver. Greenberg introduced Bronfman to him, and they hit it off.

"Cannell took a chance on me. It took a leap on his part to bring me into this partnership," said Bronfman, who described it as a turning point.

During the late 1980s, the pair built and administered North Shore Studios, where The X-Files was made.

He and Cannell sold their interest in the studio to Lionsgate in 1996. "It was an offer we couldn't refuse," he recalled.

At around the time he was building North Shore Studios, Bronfman founded Comweb Corp., a private, horizontally integrated company.

Today, Comweb is a behemoth, holding shares in Astral Media and Pinewood Toronto Studios, a 260,000-square-foot facility with a 45,000-square-foot stage.

Comweb, too, has a controlling interest in William F. White International Inc., a provider of state-of-the-art lighting, grip, camera support and related film and TV production equipment with six offices from Halifax to Vancouver.

Having expanded its reach, William F. White International is now partners with Sparks Camera & Lighting Ltd., a Budapest-based motion-picture-production equipment company that services the western and eastern European markets.

In 1993, Comweb established Protocol Entertainment Inc., which developed, financed and produced TV shows and movies for the North American and global markets. Bronfman sold it in 2005.

Two years after forming Protocol, he learned he had that most debilitating and devastating of diseases, multiple sclerosis, or MS, which devours the nerves connecting the spinal cord to the limbs.

The first disconcerting symptoms were tingling toes and feet, followed by an inability to move his hands and feet. Today, he cannot walk, much less get out of bed or feed himself without help.

"It has had a major impact, but it has made me even more stubborn," said Bronfman, who requires two special assistants to get him through a day and on his business trips.

"I won't let this bloody disease beat me. I've got a great wife and great colleagues. Despite this disease, I'm pretty blessed."

Much to his satisfaction, his wife and 24-year-old daughter, Alexandra, work in close proximity with him.

Judy helps in customer relations. "My clients like her more than me," he quipped. Alexandra wears two hats, working in property management and corporate events.

His son, Jonathan, 23, is a producer's assistant in Toronto and his youngest son, Andrew, 20, is a third-year student at McGill University in Montreal.

Bronfman – a member of the board of governors of the Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital – is riding high these days.

The economy may be running into turbulence, but Comweb is thriving. "We actually turned a profit, and we're looking forward to another good year."

American football continues to grow in the Holy Land

Andrew Gershman
JTA

JERUSALEM — It's a cold Thursday night in Jerusalem, and by the looks of it, you'd think there was a meeting of the United Nations under way. Men are speaking in Hebrew, English, Arabic, Russian and French, but they're not talking peace. They're here to settle the score – literally.

The cross-section of Jews, Arabs and Christians are here to play American tackle football as part of the Kraft Family Israel Football League (IFL). Entering its fifth year, the IFL has more than doubled since its launch in 2007 – it now has 10 teams.

The IFL traces its history back more than two decades, to a group of touch football players – mostly American immigrants and post-high schoolers studying in Israel – who established a football league in 1988. Six years later, the modest effort would grow into American Football in Israel, a non-profit organization recognized by Israel's Ministry of Education as the sport's governing body, which today has dozens of men's and women's flag football teams across the country.

With the growth of flag football, a separate group of guys who had been playing tackle football had someplace to call home, and the IFL was created under the umbrella of American Football in Israel.

"It was these players who came to our organization, American Football in Israel, to set up a more organized league, which led us down the path to where we are today," said Uriel Sturm, the IFL's commissioner.

The league consists of two teams from Jerusalem, the Kings and the Lions; one from Gush Etzion, the defending champion Judean Rebels; and two from Tel Aviv, the Sabres and the Pioneers. The Be'er Sheva Black Swarm, Haifa Underdogs, Northern Stars, Petach Tikvah Troopers and the Hatikvah Hammers round out the roster. And while the overwhelming majority of players are Israeli citizens, they hail from countries as far afield as Ukraine, France and Barbados.

"I think the IFL needs to be known in every city, and the way to do so is to expand while keeping a good level of play," said Roey Ziv, a league veteran who once played for the Haifa Underdogs and now suits up for the expansion Northern Stars.

The level of play has continued to improve over the league's five-year history. Players range in talent from football newbies to Division I college talent. The latter category includes offensive lineman "Big Mike" Gondelman, a former player at Troy University in Alabama. At six-foot-nine and 402 pounds, Gondelman is an addiction and crisis counsellor in Jerusalem who believes football can be therapeutic.

"There are thousands of studies proving that, as well as personal stories I've seen through my work and in the IFL," Gondelman said.

Jeremy Sable, an offensive lineman/linebacker for the Tel-Aviv-Jaffa Sabres, played a year of football at Cheltenham High School in suburban Philadelphia but had to quit because the games were played on Shabbat. When he moved to Israel following his graduation from the University of Maryland, Sable connected with one of the Sabres players through a fellow Philadelphian.

"When I walked away from high school football, I thought I would never have a chance to play again," Sable said. "Here in Israel, I am able to fulfil my dream of living in the Jewish state, while once again playing the sport I love."

Israeli-born Chen Doron, a wide receiver for the Beersheva Black Swarm, had never played football before the IFL. He took up the sport at age 23.

"I was attracted to tackle football because it's a sport for any given size or speed or weight and so on," Doron said. "I also like football because of the team play that is required, rather than being a one-man game."

As an amateur league, one downside of the IFL is the cost to play. Players must buy their own uniforms and equipment, purchase insurance and cover the costs of travel to and from games. Ziv says it's the league's biggest problem.

"You can't ask a guy who has never played football before to spend all that money," he said. "Brand-new gear costs approximately 2,000 shekels (about $500), and pants, jerseys, insurance and everything else cost around 1,000 (about $250)."

Even for an experienced player like Gondelman, the financial commitment can take a toll.

"I've spent the last seven months rebuilding the Kings, working some months as much as 40 hours a week just to play ball," he said.

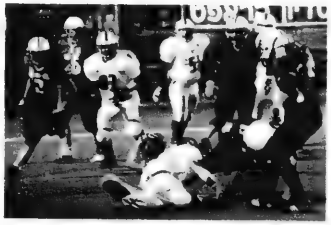
The league also struggles with transitory players. Many players are in Israel for just a year of study. Job offers and military service also get in the way of their consistent attendance. Last year's most valuable player, Alex Swieca of the Judean Rebels, was a walk-on redshirt freshman quarterback this fall at the University of Michigan.

But the constant turnover also creates excitement. The Rebels lost six key players from last year's championship squad but have managed to add some new talent.

"We are embracing the target painted on our back, although that is no different than last year," said Betzalel Friedman, head coach of the Rebels. "I am interested in seeing how all of the teams improved."

For some participants, playing football in Israel is about much more than sports.

"Our team's success comes from the fact that the majority of us really love and care for each other," Sable said. "We don't simply block for each other because we want to win, but rather because we won't allow anyone to hit or hurt our friend and teammate.



The Israel Football League is proving popular among Israelis and others who love the four-down game. The league now boasts 10 teams.

"The greatest moment of my IFL career has to be prior to the Israel Bowl, in 2010 and in 2011. Nothing beats the emotion I felt standing on the field at Kraft (Stadium in Jerusalem) singing Hatikvah with my teammates prior to the championship games."

'Jewish lobby' gets the blame

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Canada is being accused of employing antisemitic language in criticizing Israeli policy toward the Palestinians.

Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center said in a statement that Rev. Rick Horst repeated "a common antisemitic canard, attributed 'injustices' perpetrated against the Palestinians to 'Zionist and Jewish lobbies in the west.'"

"The Presbyterian Church of Canada's allowing itself to be a vehicle of antisemitism and the enabling of terrorism is something to be condemned in the strongest terms," the Wiesenthal Center said on its website.

Rev. Horst categorically rejected any suggestion his remarks were anti-Semitic.

"Clearly they were not," he told The CJN. "I quite love the Jewish community. I always have and I always will. It doesn't mean you can't love the Palestinians as well."

Rev. Horst said his comments expressed his concern over an "imbalance of power" between Palestinians and Israelis. "My concern is to see a redress of a balance of power that would allow both Jews and Palestinians to live with security."

Rev. Horst's controversial remarks were delivered Dec. 15 at St. Andrew's Church in Toronto, during a noon-hour reflection that looked back on his recent trip to the Middle East. In his remarks, Horst said, "Palestinians are daily harassed and abused and treated with indignities that are simply not allowable under international law, yet it continues to persist because of, frankly, the power of the Jewish lobbies both in America and, frankly, all around the world, including Canada."

"Palestinians are in fact not a terrorist nation but a terrorized nation," he went on to say. "Too many uncritical, simplistic, level Christians around the world believe that Israel's claim as God's chosen people allows it to do virtually anything under the guise of security in Israel/Palestine to protect their land."

Rev. Horst said he was "musing out loud" when he delivered his remarks. "I'm wondering how [Israel] has such a powerful impact and such a small voice for Palestinians."

The 2001 census found 409,830 members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Travel organization founder has a social conscience

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

The November sun streams through the windows of this busy Bloor Street office, situated in the heart of Toronto's Koreatown.

Books and papers are piled neatly here and there, and four young staffers sit side by side at their desks, excitedly engaged in conversation.

This is Operation Groundswell's (OG) headquarters, a non-profit travel organization for university students and graduates aged 18 to 30 who wish to volunteer abroad.

Established in 2007 by friends and avid travellers David Berkal and Jonah Brotman, OG is one of several startup companies Berkal has helped build and grow.

Berkal is proud of OG for being a successful social-enterprise model.

"We are not just trying to be a big-box volunteer travel organization, rather, we are looking to spark a 'groundswell' of backpackers committed to making a difference globally."

And making a difference is clearly evident in everything that Berkal does. The seeds of his work have been planted in Canada and abroad.

In 2009, in addition to OG, Berkal helped develop the Canadian Roots Exchange, a non-profit student-exchange program for 18- to 30-year-olds. Funded in the past by the Ontario government, the Canadian Roots Exchange sends groups of native and non-native students to aboriginal reserves across Canada to exchange and share knowledge, art and culture.

Boyishly handsome and casually dressed, 23-year-old Berkal looks like a laid-back kind of guy. He speaks softly when he describes his achievements over the last few years, making it all sound so easy.

Having recently obtained a degree in peace and conflict studies at the University of Toronto, Berkal already has a list of accomplishments that would make a 40-year-old blush.

Since high school, Berkal has not only been recognized for his academic prowess, but also for his leadership role at U of T and throughout the Toronto community.

He was awarded the Dean's Student Leadership Award in 2011 – U of T's most prestigious leadership award given to only one student a year.

Last summer, Berkal was the valedictorian for The Next 36 Entrepreneurial Leadership Institute. Each summer, the institute helps 36 undergraduate students from across Canada launch their careers through a program that consists of academic and personal mentorship from some of Canada's business leaders.

David Berkal

Refreshingly humble, Berkal almost forgets to mention that he has just been nominated for Oxford University's Rhodes Scholarship, one of the most acclaimed postgraduate awards in the world.

Growing up in Toronto with his parents and older brother, Berkal claims he was raised "with an eye to social justice."

These values were further instilled while he attended Hashomer Hatzair's Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont., for much of his childhood and adolescence.

In fact, it was during the summer of 2006, after he graduated from high school, that the idea of creating a volunteer program for young adults took root.

Berkal's close friend, Brotman, had just returned home after doing an internship in Ghana and was disappointed with his experience abroad.

While planning his own gap year, Berkal was disheartened with the existing student volunteer options.

Together, Brotman and Berkal thought that they could create a more meaningful student volunteer program.

In October 2007, Berkal travelled to Ghana for two months, to design a volunteer program using the contacts Brotman had made. Back in Toronto, Brotman did the groundwork, assembling the first group of OG participants, who were scheduled to depart the following May.

The feedback from the first OG trip was positive, and in the last six years, the organization has served more than 200 participants from around the world.

Programs are offered year-round to destinations such as Guatemala, the Middle East, East and West Africa, Peru, Southeast Asia, India and Haiti.

OG's 2012 lineup now includes volunteer touring trips for high school students and 12-day programs for empty nesters. Each group of eight to 12 participants has two leaders. The importance of working together as a group is evident in all of OG's programs. Berkal credits OG's focus on group work to his involvement with Hashomer Hatzair.

"When people are travelling for the first time to the developing world, there's a lot to take in. Having a group experience definitely makes the trip more meaningful," Berkal says.

Educating volunteers about what it means to be an ethical volunteer is also at the forefront of OG's mission.

"We do backpacking with a purpose. We explore the culture, and have a genuine experience mixed with important community-requested projects. We travel off the beaten track, not the typical tourist guidebook thing," Berkal says.

Accommodations include a mix of camping, living in "homestays" (renting from a local family) or apartments.

Berkal is pleased with the growth of OG, but he doesn't plan to dilute the underlying message of his non-profit organization, which focuses on creating a positive impact on the participants and many communities abroad.

"We're trying to build the best and biggest, ethical, genuine, affordable organization," he says.

A six-week volunteer excursion runs about $2,500, but Berkal understands that this cost may be out of reach for some people and offers a scholarship for those in need.

Making connections

Have you ever been in a conversation with a person and discovered a connection unrelated to your current situation? I recently had such an experience at the ClimateSpark Accelerate workshop, which took place in early December.

Ten teams that emerged from an online crowdsourcing competition that sought initiatives leading to significant local reductions in energy consumption and greenhouse gas emissions, which I described in my September column, were invited to participate in a session co-sponsored by the Toronto Atmospheric Fund and the Center for Social Innovation.

One of the 10 competition finalists came from the Robbins Hebrew Academy and the Leo Baeck Day School. Their entry focused on an inter-school effort to collaborate on ways to reduce energy consumption and quantify the amount of energy saved.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Another entry, ZooShare, was being championed by Daniel Bida, president of ReGenerate Biogas Inc., a dedicated developer of community-owned biogas plants. ZooShare Biogas Co-operative Inc. is a non-profit renewable energy co-operative that's developing a 500-kilowatt community-owned biogas plant on the grounds of the Toronto Zoo. It turns the zoo's annual manure output and food waste from GTA-based grocery stores into electricity, heat, fertilizer and cash for the zoo. (http://bit.ly/cjntsj-zooshare)

I had heard of another biogas project from Shai Spetgang, a graduate of USDS, now the Robbins Hebrew Academy. Spetgang completed his environmental studies degree at York University's faculty of environmental sciences. He subsequently spent time at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies at Ben-Gurion University, and he and his family made aliyah in 2009.

I met Spetgang in Israel early in 2011, when I was presenting at the fourth annual Renewable Energy Conference in Eilat. After that conference, Spetgang shared with me a link to a biogas project he had worked on.

In Susya, in the Southern Hebron hills, local families have to spend about $15 per 1,000 litres of water, and up to $20 for cooking gas. Alumni of the Arava Institute installed a biogas system that provides cooking fuel, fertilizes agricultural projects and reduces greenhouse gas emissions.

Another system installed by that team filters grey water – from the shower, kitchen or bath – then mixes it with sheep manure. It's allowed to ferment for a while in a sack where anaerobic fermentation takes place, producing combustible methane. (http://bit.ly/cjntsj-sheepgas)

Liquid compost is created when bacteria break down the organic matter. It is then used to irrigate and fertilize vegetables and olives trees. At the same time, the gas is diverted to a pressurized storage mechanism, which powers a stove.

Previously, families in the area cooked on wood fires that produced a lot of smoke, releasing greenhouse gases into the atmosphere. When they use the manure for cooking, much less methane is released.

When I shared this story with Bida, he immediately saw the value of using elements of the ZooShare biogas proposal to address certain social needs of people in some native communities in Canada.

This social angle, added to the existing commercial angle of the ZooShare team's proposal, may help them win the ClimateSpark competition. Interesting connections can lead to interesting results.

CREAMY ROASTED CAULIFLOWER SOUP

- 2 heads cauliflower cut into florets
- 1 onion, chopped
- 8 garlic cloves, chopped
- 6-8 c vegetable stock or parve chicken stock
- 1/4 c olive oil
- 2 tbsp. fresh dill, chopped
- salt
- white pepper
- 1 c light cream or substitute

Preheat oven to 300°F. Place florets, onion, garlic in bowl. Mix with oil until even coated. Place vegetables on cookie sheet lined with parchment paper in oven. Roast 60 min., turning over after 20 min. Remove from oven and cool. In large soup pot, heat stock. Add roasted vegetables, dill, salt and pepper. Bring soup to a boil, then simmer on low heat, covered 30 min. Remove from heat. With immersion blender puree soup in pot until smooth, or transfer to food processor and process until smooth. Return to heat. Stir in cream or substitute. Season with more fresh chopped dill, salt and pepper to taste. Cook until heated through.

Building alone and together

I watched my son, Noah, playing in the brick house at the Ontario Science Centre with about 20 other kids.

I watched him for two hours and was mesmerized because I felt as if I was privy to a display of what children's natural behaviour is, both individually and collectively.

I stared as my son collected the grey, very lightweight bricks and carried them up a set of stairs to the second floor of this open wooden house. He did this over and over again, as did the other children, ages (about) three to seven.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

The thing that really grabbed me was Noah and his fellow builders acted with such intent, as if this was a groundbreaking task. Like ants building the queen's castle, they ran up and down the stairs, mostly smiling, and with forward-looking gazes, as if they had been contracted to erect a special structure on a deadline. The entire scene looked like it had been created by an adult with knowledge of teamwork.

At the brick house, there appeared to be a unified objective. Yet when I looked at the group differently, I could see each child was also acting on his or her own. One child piled the bricks on the second floor. Another turned the wheel that cranked up a ladder-like structure to transport the play building material. In some ways, the children were flying solo, clueless or not interested in what was happening around them.

My son verified my perception when he told me, "Daddy, everyone was doing something different." This was after I asked him what was going on in the house. Interestingly, Noah said later that "all the kids" were building something together. He seemed to intuitively understand both dynamics.

While there was unity, with no fights, I also saw individuality in that house.

And I was baffled by the following actions: the children would build up the bricks so that they covered the pillars holding up the house, then, after great effort, they tore down the structure. This happened a lot.

I surmised that the kids were actualizing their natural drive to organize and create, as they do with Lego, then they were drawing upon another equally strong drive – destruction – the need to pull apart what they had made so they can once again rebuild, this time better.

At the brick house, children did get tired while creating this anthropological masterpiece. A few cried after being bonked on the head by a brick. But all of these expressions of frustration or venting came and went quickly, unlike what normally occurs on a jungle gym in a schoolyard, where aggressive interaction frequently leads to a breakdown of what seems like a symbiotic community.

I believe I was witness to something extraordinary at the Science Centre that day. First, I was able to be with my boy and watch him with great interest as he was the Noah for which God created this world – the individual. And I had the opportunity to study my son's behaviour as part of a collective – similar to the one that left Egypt and later constructed the State of Israel.

Throughout those two hours, I was an eyewitness to human nature at work and the sheer determination and sweat of toddlers and children expressing their essence alone, and together.

I was in awe.

From Uganda and back

Young Jews from the village of Poti in Uganda will be studying at Yeshiva of Torat Yosef in Efrat with its head, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, seen in the photo at right. At the conclusion of their studies the young men will return to Uganda to teach Judaism to their co-religionists. It is the first time that students from Uganda have been enrolled in an Israeli yeshiva.

Girl harassed by haredim has Toronto roots

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The poster child for the recent conflict between radical haredim in Beit Shemesh, Israel, and their modern Orthodox neighbours has a direct link to Toronto.

Na'ama Margolese, the eight-year-old girl who in the past few weeks came to prominence by speaking out about her increasing anxiety of walking to her nearby school for fear of being attacked by haredi men and boys who consider her manner of dress immodest, is the granddaughter of Arlene Margolese, manager of Reena's faith and cultural services department.

Contacted by The CJN last week, Arlene said her granddaughter was coping well, but she laments the growing tensions in Beit Shemesh.

The hardest thing for Na'ama is that she's "growing tired" of all the media attention, Arlene said.

"But she's a typical little eight-year-old. One of the stories in the [Israeli] newspapers said she was seven. Her response was 'I'm not seven. I'm eight.'" Arlene said. "She's also had other kids ask her for her autograph, which is hysterical."

Arlene said that all the kids at Na'ama's modern Orthodox Orot school are "pretty well traumatized" after all the verbal and physical attacks they've endured from those haredim who continue to harass them on a daily basis.

The senior Margolese characterized the whole situation as "disgusting."

She said her granddaughter, as well as her schoolmates, have been spit on and had water bombs thrown down on them by haredi men and boys standing on the rooftops along their route to school, and the school's property has even been littered with dirty diapers containing feces.

PEJE Prizes Awarded

TORONTO — Robbins Hebrew Academy in Toronto and Vancouver's King David High School were among 27 North American Jewish day schools to win $25,000 from the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE). PEJE awarded $625,000 in total Dec. 21 to schools implementing initiatives to keep day schools afloat. A total of 127 schools applied. Winners focused on raising annual revenue, tuition affordability and endowments. Thirteen are community schools. Seven are Orthodox, six Conservative and one is Reform.

Lego Work Bought

WARSAW — A Nazi concentration camp made of Lego that was criticized for trivializing the Holocaust was purchased by the Museum of Modern Art in Warsaw. The museum reportedly paid $71,800 to a Norwegian collector for the 1996 piece by Polish artist Zbigniew Libera. It features crematoria and barracks made from Legos, as well as Lego inmates being beaten by Lego guards. It is "one of the most important works of contemporary Polish art," the museum said in a statement. It reportedly will go on display later this year.

Hacker Strikes Again

JERUSALEM — The Saudi hacker who released the credit card details of thousands of Israelis has released 11,000 more. The hacker, named OxOmar, is a member of the Saudi hacking group Group-XP. In a Jan. 5 Internet message, he said he has hacked some 80 Israeli websites and will release one million credit card numbers with personal information. Credit card firms said the information released Jan. 5 comes from newly issued cards that they cancelled before any transactions could be carried out. Earlier last week, the hacker released a list of 400,000 credit cards with personal information, but with duplicates and false information, the number of cardholders affected was about 15,000. OxOmar told Ynet in an e-mail interview that he will also release documents from military contractors and companies that manufacture surveillance equipment.

Prominent Jews Named to Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Businessman Aldo Bensadoun and musician Yuli Turovsky of Montreal, along with former eBay president Jeff Skoll and Toronto pediatrician Alvin Zipursky, have been appointed officers of the Order of Canada, while Toronto businessman and philanthropist Lawrence Bloomberg was named a member of the Order, Gov.- Gen. David Johnston announced Dec. 30.

Aldo Bensadoun

Bensadoun is executive chairman of the Montreal-based Aldo Group, a worldwide shoe-store chain he founded 40 years ago. He is cited for his "achievements as a business executive and for his social and philanthropic engagement."

Aldo was one of the first companies to join the fight against AIDS in 1985 and is a major supporter of Hope and Cope, Montreal's Jewish General Hospital-based psychosocial support program for cancer patients.

Turovsky founded I Musici de Montréal, an acclaimed chamber orchestra, in 1983 and was its conductor until his retirement last May. He's being recognized for his "contribution to the promotion of Canada's musical excellence as a teacher, and as an internationally renowned cellist and conductor."

The California-based Skoll heads the Skoll Foundation, which awards $80 million in grants annually. He was cited for his philanthropy. Zipursky, a doctor at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, was cited for his contribution to pediatrics here and in developing countries.

Bloomberg's many community activities include being chairman of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Artist Charles Pachter and businessman Seymour Schulich, both of Toronto, were also promoted from members to officers of the Order.

Russia bans human rights campaigner

Myron Love

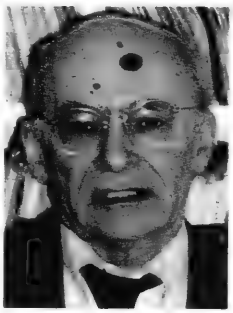
WINNIPEG — Nobel Peace Prize nominee David Matas, one of the world's leading human rights campaigners, has been banned from Russia because a book he co-wrote with former MP David Kilgour exposing China's abuse of Falun Gong members has been condemned as "extremist literature."

The ban was put into effect in 2008, yet neither Matas nor Kilgour were informed of the situation. Matas only found out when he was invited to be the keynote speaker at a conference Kyiv, Ukraine, last spring on Internet hate speech. Matas was quite surprised when a Russian participant informed him that his book on the Falun Gong was included on a list of books that had been banned in Russia.



David Matas

The Falun Gong is a Chinese grassroots spiritual group that China's Communist government considers a threat, Matas said, because the group is independent of the Communist party. Falun Gong was banned in China in 1999 and thousands of its adherents have been jailed and murdered, with the government removing their organs for transplants.

Matas and Kilgour wrote reports on the persecution of Falun Gong members and the theft of their organs in two reports in 2006 and 2007 and published their book, Bloody Harvest, in 2009. The earlier reports were translated into Russian and distributed in the country. A local court in Krasnodar in the east banned the reports in 2008 on the grounds that they might create a negative image of China.

"We weren't notified at all, and we played no part in the legal procedure," Matas said.

As to why a negative report on China should be banned in Russia, Matas said that he can't explain the Russian thinking. "I don't think the Russians can explain themselves," he said. "It may be a matter of authoritarian solidarity. Non-democratic governments tend to stick together."

Matas said Russian human rights and democracy activists appealed the ban, with Matas and Kilgour filing a statement for the appeal. Last month, a higher court in the Krasnodar region upheld the ban.

"I am not sure if our statement was read out in court," Matas said. "The next step will be to appeal to a higher court in Moscow and possibly to the European Court of Human Rights."

Matas has also asked the Harper government to protest the ban.

At the Kyiv conference last spring, Matas was invited to speak in Russia in 2012, but that is not going to be possible unless the ban is lifted.

"The people who will be disadvantaged by this are the Russian people," Matas said. "Without freedom of speech, they will not have access to all that is going on in the world."

Claude Rochon, spokesperson for Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada, said the department is looking into the matter. "Canada takes matters of freedom of expression very seriously," she said. "The promotion of Canadian values features prominently in our ongoing dialogue with the Russian authorities."

Officials at the Russian Embassy in Ottawa were unavailable for comment last week, as the embassy was closed for the holidays.

JEWISH FUNERALS

"Know that the highest standard of observance is here for you, in times of sorrow."
Michael Benjamin

People often tell me our strict adherence to the principle of kavod ha-met, respect for the dead, reassures them that they are doing the right thing. Our devout Chevra Kadisha has operated since 1922. Every year, we commission a new keepsake plate for members – tangible evidence that they are part of the longest serving burial society in Toronto. You can see the plates from each of our 87 years in a cabinet in the chapel foyer.

Seeing what can be

From the editor's desk...

We have always been taught that telling the truth requires telling the whole truth. Half a truth is half a lie.

Whether we are giving testimony under oath or recounting the details of an interesting event to our friends, we feel obliged as a matter of conscience and duty to tell the whole story. It is part of our culture to do so. It is part of the honour system of our values that underpins our open, democratic, fair play, rule of law way of life

We expect to hear and read the whole story.

And yet, when it comes to Israel, we seldom hear, see or read the whole story from the innumerable media outlets that camp out in Jerusalem or report on the Jewish state from every other conceivable spot on earth.

To be sure, it is impossible to report the whole story of any country on earth, let alone one whose society is as diverse and complicated as that of Israel. And of course, as with all countries on earth, there are also ugly stories that comprise the entirety of the truth of that society.

The recent extremist, misogynist behaviour among some small groups of haredim is one such ugly story from Israel that has, deservedly, received coverage in the media.

So, too, does Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, deservedly, receive a great deal of coverage in the media.

But the aggressive haredim or the conflict with the Palestinians is not the whole story of Israel.

The whole story of Israel includes the remarkable achievements of this tiny country of some 7.8 million people in every field of science, technology, health and the humanities.

The CJN is determined to publish more stories of these remarkable achievements. Occasionally, they will be discussed in this space.

It is important that we do this for the honesty of conveying more of the whole story about Israel. The ugly truths, we can be certain, will always be reported in friendly and unfriendly media. But the beautiful truths, we can also be certain, less so.

Another reason it is so very important for us to do this is to convey a sense of what could be in the Middle East if only some of its neighbours would set aside their atavistic hatred toward the Jewish state, and to convey a sense of what could happen in the wider world, with millions and millions of people benefiting from Israeli innovations and advancements that help and improve the lives of human beings.

One such story that went somewhat under the radar in the waning days of 2011 was the announcement by New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, that the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa and Cornell University had won the bid to establish NYCTech, a new Applied Sciences Graduate School on Roosevelt Island in New York City. The schools' joint proposal was chosen from seven competing international institutions of considerable renown.

The campus will have a fantastic, futuristic look and comprise more than two million square feet when completed, home eventually to 2,500 students and 280 professors. Classes, however, will begin in temporary accommodations this year. The myriad spin-off benefits for New York City and the surrounding area will be enormous and long lasting.

Part of the joint project includes a promise by Cornell University's board of trustees to provide $150 million in venture funding to help get fledgling startups off the ground. As reported in the New York media, the new NYCTech campus "will provide all of the necessary legal and financial conditions to help ripe new businesses focused on urban planning, medicine, advertising and finance get off the ground. These will include a pre-seed financing program, legal support, partnership building and business competitions designed to spur innovation."

Not surprisingly, the announcement last month generated a great deal of excitement in the scientific community. In the community of the eco-concerned environmentalists however, the announcement was electric.

Susan Kraemer explained why in her article on the Green Prophet website dedicated, as its name suggests, to fostering and encouraging new environment-friendly technology and practices. "The Technion revealed that the NYCTech Campus will be among the most environmentally friendly campuses on earth.

"If it were completed today, the hub would be the largest net-zero energy building in eastern United States, [as] energy will be derived from a 1.8-megawatt solar array and 400 geothermal wells that will cool the buildings in summer and heat them in winter. The NYCTech Campus will not only employ the world's most sophisticated environmental technology, but will also act as a living laboratory for the built environment hub."

Indeed, Israel's cleantech technologies are extolled throughout the electronic pages of Green Prophet. This, too, is not the whole story of Israel. But it is one of the beautiful truths that must be told.

Chabad Ontario launches overnight camp

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario will open an overnight camp in Haliburton this summer, some five years after the organization purchased a 200-acre lakefront site with 6,000 feet of shoreline.

It is the organization's second overnight camp in Canada. The other is in Quebec, and there are a handful in the United States.

Chabad has run a day camp in Thornhill for more than 30 years that serves 600 children each summer. In the early 1990s, it ran an overnight camp at a rented site for three years.

The new $6-million camp is expected to open in July with a four-week session for boys, to be followed by a session in August for girls.

The Sidney and Naomi Spiegel Camp Gan Israel was already zoned for overnight camp use. Lubavitch purchased an existing non-Jewish camp on Lake Basshaunt for $2 million in 2007, and has raised $5 million to date.

In an article on lubavitch.com, lead sponsor Sidney Spiegel, president of Crawford Metal, said he "was not fortunate enough to have the opportunity to go to camp" and that the outdoors is "very beneficial for all children."

Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, the driving force behind the creation of the camp, said that Lubavitch overnight camps are called Gan Israel to honour the memory of the Baal Shem Tov, the 18th-century rabbi who founded Chassidism, whose given name was Yisrael. The late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, named the camps because the Baal Shem Tov frequented the wilderness, Rabbi Grossbaum said. "That's where you serve God without interference," he added.

Camp activities will include daily Torah classes and davening, team sports, hiking, and waterfront activities like swimming, rowing, canoeing and sailing.

The camp recently received a grant for a full-size basketball court, Rabbi Grossbaum said. He added that the camp is based on a model serving 150 campers per session, but this summer he expects about half that number.

Enrolment for one session is approximately $2,000. The rabbi noted that the organization is working on a program to bring down the cost. "We're very sensitive to the challenges families have raising children – the cost of education and of camps."

Rabbi Grossbaum's son Rabbi Itchy Grossbaum, will serve as camp director. He will continue his involvement as director of Chabad's Friendship Circle, a program that pairs teens with special needs children.

The younger rabbi, 28, said he's excited about the new camp. As director, he aims to bring "a warmth of Yiddishkeit, and of life in general" to the campers, he said.

Having attended Chabad camps in Ontario and New York, he believes the experience creates unity and fosters long-lasting friendships.

Canadians urged to shop Bed, Bath & Beyond

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada's main pro-Israel advocacy group is urging Canadians to shop at housewares retailer Bed, Bath & Beyond in response to a call last month to boycott Israeli-made Ahava cosmetics and SodaStream home carbonation products being sold at the U.S.-based chain.

Buycott Israel, an initiative of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) that was started in 2009 to encourage consumers to support Israeli-made products in response to boycott actions, sent out an alert to its followers last week in response to a flash-mob demonstration in a Bed, Bath & Beyond store in Larkspur, California on Dec. 10.

Sara Saber-Freedman

There have been no reports of protests at the company's Canadian outlets – located in Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island – said Sara Saber-Freedman, the Montreal-based executive vice-president of CIJA and the lead on the Buycott file.

The boycott was organized by the U.S.-based group Codepink, which has targeted Ahava products in the past. The group describes itself as "a women-initiated grassroots peace and social justice movement."

It claims that Ahava cosmetics and SodaStream home carbonation products "are fraudulently labelled as 'Made in Israel,' but are in fact produced in illegal Israeli settlements, under the conditions of a military occupation in the West Bank, outside the internationally recognized borders of Israel."

Ahava counters that the minerals used in its products are mined in the Israeli part of the Dead Sea, which is undisputed internationally, and that Mitzpe Shalem, the West Bank kibbutz where Ahava products are produced, is not an illegal settlement.

Ahava and SodaStream products were targeted at some U.S. outlets.

Saber-Freedman said she was gratified that many U.S. Jewish organizations, such as the American Jewish Committee and the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, have latched onto the buycott method to fight such situations as they arise in the U.S.

"Buycott is a tool that's only as strong as the breadth of participation. We're proud to be a part of what continues to be one of the few examples of open-source advocacy," she said.

"We will follow up with Bed, Bath & Beyond. But the message to the people calling for this boycott is that the immediate result of them organizing a boycott is that there will be an increase in sales of the product they're boycotting," Saber-Freedman said.

A U.S.-based spokesperson said the chain won't pull the Israeli products.

"In order to offer our valued customers the widest selection possible, Bed Bath & Beyond carries products from all over the world," Rachael Risinger said. "As long as our customers continue to purchase and enjoy those products, we will continue to make those products available to our customers."

Saber-Freedman said said the buycott tactic has "worked pretty much every time" it has been employed.

In 2009, hundreds of pro-Israel consumers converged on a mid-town Toronto LCBO outlet to counter a call to boycott Israeli wines. Within a few hours, the store had sold out of its stock of about 150 cases of Israeli wine.

Last year, Saber-Freedman and Buycott Israel helped dispel rumours that The Bay had removed Ahava beauty products from its shelves as part of a boycott request from Canadian anti-Israel group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME).

The Bay had in fact temporarily removed the products from its stores in order to make room for a rebranded Ahava line that it continues to sell.

Last week, CIJA refreshed the old Buycott Israel website and Facebook page to update its functionality and "feel," Saber-Freedman said.

A vile sight

The young, confused-looking child seen in the photo below was perversely exploited by a mean-spirited adult or group of adults. Intended to mimic the pose of the dramatic, iconic image of the Jewish youngster leaving the Warsaw Ghetto, surrendering to the sneering Nazis surrounding him, his hands held high, the lad below is nothing more than a grotesque prop in a hateful scene of twisted, depraved political theatre.

Two weeks ago, on motza'ei Shabbat, some 1,000 haredim took to the streets in the Mea Shearim neighbourhood of Jerusalem to protest what they described as intolerance and persecution by mainstream Israelis against their way of life. It was a reaction on their part to the condemnation by most of the Jewish world merely days before of the aggressive, extremist, even violent behaviour of a small band of other haredim in Beit Shemesh.

The Jerusalem protesters used images of the Holocaust to make their point, comparing the treatment they receive at the hands of mainstream Israelis to the treatment the Jews received in World War II at the hands of the Nazis. Many wore yellow stars with the word "Jude" written on them. Some young children were brought to a makeshift stage wearing yellow stars on the infamous striped prison garb. And of course, at least one young boy replicated the horrific scene from the Warsaw Ghetto.

Last week in this space, The CJN lamented the blatant disrespect for the rule of law among the small group of extremist, haredi zealots. This week we lament the blatant disrespect for their fellow Jews, qua Jews and even more fundamentally, qua thinking, feeling, sentient human beings. The behaviour by this group of brutal, callous ignorant people was so execrable that it cannot pass without comment. The history they so cavalierly abused is too solemn to go undefended.

As Elie Wiesel told Ha'aretz, his heart broken, his emotions enraged: "How dare they? To both desecrate the honour of the State of Israel and the memory of the Holocaust? In all the difficult moments and times of crisis which Israel and the Jewish people have seen, I don't remember seeing such a vile sight."

The leaders of the people who marched in so disgraceful a manner two weeks ago must reject and expunge such foul behaviour from their midst. They might suggest to the protesters the words of the famous 16th-century scholar and kabbalist, Chaim Vital, whose works many of them probably know and even study, if not actually follow: "If you hate your fellow Jew, it is as though you hate God who created them."

Israeli interior minister Rabbi Yitzhak Peretz, head of the Orthodox Shas Party, resigned his cabinet post rather than confirm the identity of a Reform convert, calling such conversions a "travesty" that "threatened the survival of the Jewish People." His party's four-man Knesset faction remained in prime minister Yitzhak Shamir's governing coalition.

Building Jews, not buildings

Eli Rubinstein got it right in "Can education alone save the Jewish People?" (Dec. 8). Our ongoing struggle to ensure that Jewish education is available in our community and is supported by donors and by communal leaders is meaningless unless that education and learning leads to real action and to practice. Merely educating our children and the next generation about our traditions, our history and our customs without making a personal commitment to follow and to do will not secure our future. Building buildings or institutions, and providing teachers to teach in them, is not the essence; building Jews is, and that requires translating that education into personal practice.

Extremist haredi behaviour

While I respect the right of Israel's haredi Jewish community to observe Judaism as they see fit, with all its traditions and observances, I do not support the actions of that segment of Judaism trying to impose their views on secular Jews throughout Israel ("Netanyahu vows to end extremist haredi behaviour"; "Segregation in Beit Shemesh causes uproar," Jan. 5). Calling Israeli police and soldiers Nazis and dressing up children with outfits and Stars of David reminiscent of Holocaust times are an insult to those who perished at the hands of Nazi Germany as well as the fortunate Jews who survived. The rioting haredi Jews forget that Israel is a true democracy where the rights of other co-religionists and those of other religions must be respected. Their attacks on secular and less observant Jews are no better than what is being witnessed by the Taliban in Afghanistan and the Muslim fundamentalists in Egypt. The right to practise religious orthodoxy is not analogous to the intolerant practice of sharia law in Muslim countries.

CJC needed a facelift, not burial

As a volunteer for the Canadian Jewish Congress National Archives for more than 25 years, I catalogued and sorted thousands of files. ("Legitimacy questions continue to plague CIJA," Dec. 22). Among them were CJC's plenary files. Every Jewish organization in Canada had the right to send a delegation to a CJC plenary, which took place every two or three years. The delegates cast their ballots to elect the officers of the CJC. Somebody please tell me, who elected the people of Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs? Who gave these people the right to make a power grab and kill the CJC? I grant, the CJC needed a facelift, and it would have so happened down the road, but not a burial.

Quoted in the article is an e-mail written by CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel. It states: "However, understanding of Congress and its legacy drops off very dramatically with the under-45 demographic within our community, who cannot relate to the name [or] the legacy (e.g., most don't even remember the USSR or Soviet Jewry)." The continuous daily stream of researchers to the CJC archives, however, shows a strong awareness of the past accomplishments of the CJC.

CIJA will have a difficult task to match the past accomplishments of CJC. The great leaders of the CJC of yesteryear left their everlasting imprint on the Jewish community of Canada. CIJA will have some catching up to do. So far, they have not even reached the starting line.

Signs' message is chauvinistic

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has received a notice from the city of Vaughan that its signs are a problem ("UJA signs violate Vaughan bylaws," Dec. 8). Although the complaint is only about the wording of the signs – "Jewish Toronto Lives Here" – since Vaughan is not Toronto, I, like letter-writer Bert Raphael (Nov. 24), cannot see the purpose of these signs put up by the federation around the GTA. UJA campaign director Steven Shulman says that they have been put up "simply to create awareness of what federation does." I think this is far too costly a way to achieve this, especially since Vaughan city council may want a $24,000 fee for allowing the signs. Also, the message on the signs, which pinpoint Jewishly themed buildings or locations, appears to be unnecessarily chauvinistic.

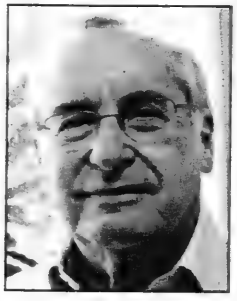
The indigent survivor: a global emergency

Dov Harris
Special to The CJN

They are our brothers and sisters, but we have not been their keepers.

According to the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, some 260,000 Holocaust survivors – about half of the approximately 517,000 who are still alive today – live in poverty. The majority of the poor, about 90,000, live in countries of the former Soviet Union and some 70,000 live in Israel.



Dov Harris

As time runs out for these elderly people, our moral failure to address the plight of survivors who were unable to reconnect with society and who now live out their lives at its edges, in penury and in poor health, is a colossal sin of omission of historic proportions.

It is by no means the purpose of this article to analyze the failure or otherwise of official bodies or non-profits that have undertaken the responsibility to deal with the situation. Such an analysis would shift the focus from where it should be: to expose our baffling response to the plight of the destitute survivor.

Our relationship to the survivor, our living link to the most appalling calamity in our history, is quite unlike any other. We are bound at the most primal biological level: our Jewish birth. For survivors, it meant the most horrific consequences; for us today, the privilege to be part of a people writing a glorious chapter in its history. We cannot undo history, but consider how just it would have been had all survivors, even the poorest, been treated as treasured beings by their resurgent people, a people risen from the ashes. The mystery is why it never happened.

In 2011, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) Myers-JDC-Brookdale Institute carried out a study in Israel, where some 208,000 victims of Nazi atrocities live. Approximately 33 per cent or 66,000 live below the poverty line. A number live in "shameful conditions." Ron Kalinsky, the CEO of the Foundation for Holocaust Victims in Israel, told the Jerusalem Post. These survivors are among the poorest elderly in Israel. They die in indignity amid the plenty of a sovereign Jewish homeland.

As shocking as that is, the situation of survivors living in poverty in countries of the former Soviet Union is scandalous, despite the best efforts of the cash-strapped JDC. "An estimated 60,000 indigent elderly who can't afford a basic diet, let alone medicines, have been turned away… because we don't have the resources to help them," said Steve Schwager, CEO of the JDC.

This astounding number should roar across the Jewish world. How did we allow our moral compass to slip from our fingers? Pleading ignorance of their plight is damning. It is a non-starter. It should be our business to know.

Disturbing questions crowd the mind. Is it a case of wilful blindness? Is the presence of the poverty-stricken survivor so inconvenient to the Holocaust narrative that we choose to look the other way? Are they the spoilers stubbornly lingering on in dreadful circumstances inducing guilt and resentment and so better ignored, the crack running across the symmetry of a beginning and an end to the Holocaust nightmare? Or, is it simply a case of deluding ourselves, assuming they are being taken care of by official bodies, and then not asking how effective these organizations are, and if they are not effective, what can be done to redress the situation.

Some 2,500 people rallied in protest of Israel's decision to raise Holocaust survivors' pensions by less than 100 shekels a month back in 2007. Today over 200,000 survivors live in poverty, according to the Claims Conference. [Israel Sun photo]

In Canada, the survivors we are likely to meet are by and large remarkable people who've risen from their past to forge successful lives. They are witnesses to the enduring and indomitable human spirit. We are reassured, even elevated, by their success. Few of us, though, ask the question, what has become of those survivors who have not succeeded in overcoming their pasts?

The measures taken to alleviate the survivors' poverty reflect the ambivalence we have toward the inconvenient survivor. The fumbling of successive Israeli governments is a case in point.

On Aug. 21, 2007, the speaker of the Knesset, Dalia Itzik, on behalf of the Israeli government, declared, "We are here to rectify the situation [of the plight of survivors] so that we may be able to look into the survivors' eyes and tell them on behalf of Israeli society, we apologize."

Such a declaration by the central organ of government could not have been more emphatic, and yet its implementation fell far short of expectations. And this is the situation in Israel, which has all the resources of a modern state and where the Diaspora could have played a partnership role. Where were we?

What of our impoverished brethren living in countries of the former Soviet Union and elsewhere? The indignity of the twice-cursed survivor living in poverty continues, first by an apathetic world and now by their largely apathetic people.

At no time in our history have we been better prepared to transform the situation than now. The past 65 years have demonstrated what a renascent people can achieve. It has been a golden age of achievement unprecedented in our history. Never have we had such means at our disposal, never have we been so organized, never have we been freer to mount a global operation to reach even the most isolated survivor living a life of suffering, let alone the impoverished survivor living in our community.

It is not as though nothing has been done. Shafts of light are provided by the superb work done by the JDC, the Jewish Agency, the Foundation for Holocaust Victims in Israel, NGOs and other organizations. Yet for all they do, it remains insufficient. Their frustration is palpable. So much more could be done.

How long will we, the Jewish community, consider the status quo as good enough before we recognize that this is a global Jewish emergency? Without that happening, any hope of rallying our organizations and the global Jewish community in a last act of chesed is dashed – and with it, any chance to salvage our own dignity.

Soon it will be too late. On average, 12,800 survivors die each year (35 people a day). At least a quarter of them will have lived their lives in poverty, and this in Israel! We would suppose the figure for those who lived their lives in poverty to be at least equal, if not greater, in the former Soviet Union.

When the last survivor dies in poverty, we and future generations will be left to ponder the conundrum of how it came about that a people whose central tenet of morality is "Ve'ahavta lereacha kamocha," to love your neighbour as yourself, could as well, with breathtaking irony, withhold this embrace from their very own.

Travelling in Spain this Chanukah, my family and I experienced a strange worldwide phenomenon.

In Barcelona's renovated bullfighting arena, venerated as the site where the Beatles played in 1965, we saw an energetic, impressive production of the now-classic musical Grease. Watching the climactic moment when Sandy Dumbrowski, "the good girl," transforms into "the bad girl," becoming "the one that I want, ooo, ooo, ooo" in an incomprehensible foreign language was particularly depressing.

Gil Troy

The ease with which we all understood it underlined how iconic that moment has become. In fact, it symbolizes a broader transformation that has occurred since the decade of the 1950s, which the musical mocks, and even the 1970s, when the musical debuted.

For decades now, and throughout the world, Grease has been providing generations of young people with basic training in decadence and hedonism. Yes, Grease is cartoonish. And yes, Grease is entertaining. But Grease also has a message. In this world that so values being cool, Sandy Dumbrowski learns that to be cool, she must follow the fast, self-indulgent, pagan crowd.

In a different cultural context, Grease would be harmless fun. But let's face it, the Greeks won. Alas, it wasn't the Greece of Aristotelian morality and Sophoclean rigour that triumphed – although our world still benefits from Greek philosophy, science and metaphysics. Culturally, it was the Greece of Grease, the Greece of body worship and selfishness, the Greece of immediate gratification and excess.

We are lucky to be living in an age of tremendous freedom and widespread prosperity – even during these economically challenging times. Yet, we should also acknowledge the problem when freedom becomes licentiousness, when we are so liberated from tradition, from freedom, from community, that anything goes, and nobody matters.

We live in the ultimate disposable society – where nothing is enduring, not even the most basic family bonds. True, it was difficult and stultifying to live in a world that was so heavy-handed that every sentence ended with an exclamation point, but it is difficult in a different way – and unnerving – to live in a world so contingent that every sentence ends with a question mark. This Greek victory and the power of Grease daily challenge us as Jews. We risk raising a generation of live-for-today Jewish pagans and of being demanding, grasping and materialistic ourselves.

The challenge is so great that most of our institutions have simply surrendered. Ask yourself, when is the last time a Jewish institution stood up to the cultural bacchanal that is North America? Which rabbi, what teacher, which Jewish community professional, is ready to risk the wrath of the all-important donors out there and start a real, challenging, personal conversation about who we are, who our kids are and what we all are becoming?

Rather than being the proverbial squeaky wheels, most of our leaders, like most of us, slide along, with the path greased for us by fun, funny, yet fundamentally immoral and misguided cultural phenomena like Grease, in all its many languages and forms.

We should start pushing our leaders and probing ourselves. We must ask what all this materialism, all this indulgence, has wrought. Often, during economic troubles, people start posing deep, existential questions and become more altruistic, less careerist, more communitarian. If that has happened this time around, I, for one, have missed it. Most of the now-famous 99 per cent seem more dismayed at not being part of the proverbial one per cent, than outraged by their actions.

For too long, North American Judaism has been conventional, not countercultural. North American Judaism has been more effective in helping Jews acculturate to suburban norms than in liberating Jews from suburban peer pressure. Jewish civilization has much to say about how to live both individually and collectively. Yet we mostly keep the conversation confined to safe topics about the dos and don'ts of ritual rather than the rights and wrongs of ethical life. And far more of our children can quote long stretches from the musical Grease than from any of our great Jewish books, from the Bible to the Talmud, from Maimonides' Guide to the Perplexed to Theodor Herzl's Jewish State.

It is time for a Jewish reformation – we need more learning and more yearning, more ethics and more challenge; we need to put more elbow grease into personal transformation and growth rather than personal comfort and communal stasis.

Reform Judaism isn't what you thought it was

I last went to the Biennial Convention of the Union for Reform Judaism 20 years ago. A very large and professional conference, sometimes having as many as 4,000 or 5,000 people, it's meant for congregational leaders and congregational clergy from the 900 North American Reform synagogues to come together learn, share best practices, pray together, hear top-notch speakers, and recharge. I hadn't gone lately because, first of all, I wasn't serving a congregation, except for once a year on the High Holidays, and second, I felt a personal distance and even alienation from the heavy use of English in services, the emphasis on social action over religious study, and the lack of "Torah talk" in what I judged to be a religiously weak leadership.

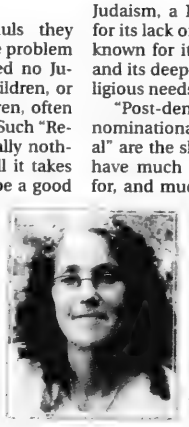
Well, this is not your father's Reform Judaism anymore, that's for sure. I walked around the recent biennial with my jaw dropped much of the time.

Services were conducted mostly in Hebrew, and everyone pronounced every word correctly. The music was awe-inspiring, featuring soulful tunes that matched the depth of the words they were accompanying. Serious Jews discussed serious topics. There were several minyanim to choose from every morning. Each evening, the whole convention came together in deep and heartfelt prayer, and Shabbat was mystical and magical, as 5,000 Reform Jews studied Torah with scholars. It was the first time in a long time I felt that Reform Jews were taking themselves seriously, without looking over their shoulders and always wondering what "they" (the Conservative, the Orthodox, whomever) were thinking of "us." It felt like a paradigm shift.

However, so many people are unaware of these changes and new models. Reform Judaism has gotten a bad rap, especially in "conservative" Toronto. Accused of being "church-like" and worse by people who may not have stepped foot in a Reform synagogue for years – or ever, for that matter – the movement is still the victim of many false assumptions: that it regularly celebrated Shabbat on Sunday (only a small handful of Reform temples actually did that in the 1890s, and later that was dropped); that services are all in English (not true at all); that all Reform temples have choirs and organs (not true, although many use musical instruments to enhance Shabbat services), or that anything goes (not true: Reform Judaism has clear standards and expectations).

How much do people know about today's "new" Reform Judaism?

They do know which shuls they wouldn't be caught dead in. The problem is that Jews who have practised no Judaism at all since they were children, or since their children were children, often say, "Well, I guess I'm Reform." Such "Reform Jews," who practice virtually nothing, erroneously believe that all it takes to be a good Reform Jew is to be a good person. I often remind such folks that anyone who is a good person is not necessarily Jewish, and anyone who is Jewish is not necessarily a good person. It's false to say Reform Judaism has no expectations on you other than being nice and helping old people across the street. You can do that by being a Boy Scout.



Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

To my mind, a small revolution has occurred in the Reform movement and I witnessed it at the biennial. There I saw Reform Jews asking the question, "How can we make a spiritually alive Reform Judaism, a Reform Judaism not famous for its lack of structure and standards but known for its high level of commitment and its deep appreciation for people's religious needs?"

"Post-denominational" and "transdenominational" and "non-denominational" are the slogans of our age. I think we have much to criticize each movement for, and much to hope for in a community that strives to transcend these boundaries. But it's time to pack away those tired stereotypes (and it wouldn't hurt if we packed away all our denominational stereotypes) and all those unfounded assumptions (which often make us feel as if we are mavens, but prove us to be ignoramuses).

We should try to judge the movements – all of them – by their best adherents, not their worst, and by their paradigm shifts and not by old jokes, hearsay and information from a decade ago. We should be open to the possibility that each of them, with all their weaknesses, has grown and changed, has something to teach us, and has something to offer in our complicated Jewish world.

The nearly nine-year U.S. military engagement in Iraq officially ended late last year – on Sunday, Dec. 18, to be exact –when a convoy of 500 troops in 110 vehicles left a base near the city of Nasiriya at 2:30 a.m. and headed southward. The convoy, guarded by overhead aircraft, rolled into Kuwait at around dawn, ending the United States' most costly and domestically divisive war since Vietnam.

In departing, the Americans left behind a tiny U.S. residual force whose tasks are to protect the massive U.S. Embassy, assist in training Iraqi soldiers and facilitate arms sales worth $11 billion.

Like Israel's stealthy withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000, the details of the United States' pullout from Iraq were deliberately kept secret to ward off possible attacks by anti-American insurgents.

That such precautions were deemed necessary speaks volumes about the parlous condition of Iraq as a new year begins.

Speaking at a White House ceremony to mark America's departure from Iraq, U.S. President Barack Obama accentuated the positive, declaring that Iraq had become a "sovereign, self-reliant and democratic" nation and a model for democracy in the Arab world. But striking a more balanced note, Obama observed that the U.S. role in Iraq would ultimately be judged by history.

The Obama administration, having inherited a war from president George W. Bush that claimed the lives of 4,487 Americans and cost U.S. taxpayers a whopping $1 trillion, has no illusions what may lie ahead now that the United States has terminated combat operations in Iraq.

In a sober assessment, U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta said, "Let me be clear: Iraq will be tested in the days ahead..." Within 48 hours of the U.S. withdrawal, two separate developments validated his sombre prediction about Iraq's future.

A political crisis erupted when Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal el-Maliki, a Shiite, issued an arrest warrant for Vice-President Tariq al-Hashimi, a Sunni. Maliki accused him of running death squads to assassinate politicians and government officials. The accusation, heatedly denied by Hashimi, threatened an American power-sharing arrangement and summoned up the twin spectres of sectarianism and civil war yet again.

And in a reprise of the endemic violence that has convulsed Iraq since 2003, car bombs and improvised explosives shattered markets, apartment buildings and schools in Baghdad, killing 70 Shiite and Sunni civilians in the worst day of bloodshed in about a year.

Taken together, these events

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

cast doubt on the ability of the country's quarrelsome ruling elite to forge peace and stability in Iraq, a nation that has stumbled from one disaster to the next in the past 30 years.

Saddam Hussein, Iraq's paramount leader from 1979 to 2003, led Iraq astray by waging war with Iran – its regional rival – in 1980 and by invading Kuwait in 1990.

Iraq's invasion of Iran touched off the longest war in the annals of the modern Middle East and cost Iraq dearly in terms of casualties and property damage and arrested development. Iraq's incursion into Kuwait, repelled by a coalition of countries in the 1991 Gulf War, led to United Nations sanctions that crippled and isolated Saddam's brutal Baathist regime.

Nuri Kamal el-Maliki

Washington, which had long hewed to a policy of dual containment in dealing with Iraq and post-revolutionary Iran, invaded Iraq in an attempt to stabilize the Middle East and make it more American-friendly.

The United States' military involvement in Iraq was preceded by its invasion of Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. The Bush administration struck Afghanistan to unseat the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban regime, which had harboured Al Qaeda, the organization that had ordered the destruction of the World Trade Center in Manhattan on Sept. 11, 2001.

The Bush administration, mired in an increasingly difficult war in Afghanistan, stretched its resources by targeting Iraq. Washington claimed that the Sunni regime in Iraq possessed nuclear, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction, and that Saddam, a prototypical secular Arab dictator, had co-operated with Al Qaeda's supreme leader, Osama bin Laden.

The first of these claims seemed plausible, but the second one was always highly questionable. Neither proved to be true, tarnishing Washington's credibility.

Once in Iraq, the United States found itself woefully ill-prepared to fight an insurgency, which has been largely characterized by a sickening spate of suicide bombings. By 2006, Iraq was slipping into a civil war pitting the majority Shiites against the minority Sunnis. In response to this crisis, Washington resorted to a "surge," dispatching yet more troops to Iraq. Within about a year, the United States had deployed 170,000 troops in Iraq. To an extent, the "surge" achieved its objective.

In a further effort to tamp down the spiral of violence, the United States co-opted Sunni tribal leaders in "Awakening" formations to combat Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia – an Al Qaeda franchise group – in restive Anbar province. The strategy, though somewhat successful, has not eliminated Al Qaeda as a threat.

Alongside these efforts to defeat the insurgents, consisting of a coalition of Islamists, disaffected nationalists and common criminals, the United States tried to improve everyday life, restore oil production to prewar levels and build a culture of democracy.

Almost a decade on, Washington's greatest achievement in Iraq was in uprooting the Baathist regime, in removing Iraq as a military threat to Israel, and in liberating Iraqis from Saddam's serial violations of human rights and his wasteful hegemonic ambitions. Iraqis are free at last, as exemplified by their unfettered access to the Internet and cable TV.

The liberation of Iraq may have been an underlying cause of the so-called Arab Spring, the popular rebellions that have ousted authoritarian leaders in Tunisia, Egypt and Libya.

Today, Iraq has all the trapping of a multi-party Jeffersonian democracy. A constitution has been written and transparent elections have taken place. In practice, however, Iraqi democracy is still a fragile flower that may yet wilt. Critics charge that Maliki, the prime minister, is a polarizing figure whose aim is to marginalize opponents and create a one-party state.

The Americans, to the best of their ability, papered over the deep sectarian divisions that continue to divide Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. But now that they are gone, observers fear that members of Iraq's security forces will be more loyal to their respective sects rather than to Iraq itself. Last week, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu warned that Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions would be suicidal for the entire region.

Although violence is generally on the wane, Iraq still remains very volatile, with 500 to 750 attacks having been recorded per month in 2011. Nonetheless, street life in Iraqi cities has virtually returned to normal.

Anti-American feelings, fanned by Iran, are deeply embedded in Iraqi society. Moktada al-Sadar, a pro-Iranian Shiite cleric whose militia fought the Americans in two uprisings in the city of Falluja in 2004, has warned that U.S. diplomats and contractors are now fair game.

In retrospect, the United States left Iraq in better shape in terms of health care, education, sewage management and accessibility to electricity and potable water. But most Iraqis receive only a few hours of electricity a day, and oil production lags far behind 1970s levels. Indeed, an agreement on dividing Iraq's oil wealth has eluded its fragmented leadership.

At the start of 2012, Iraq is a budding democracy. But its flawed leadership and its unresolved problems may yet shape and define Iraq for years to come.

Study finds Limmud builds peoplehood

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Sociologist Steven Cohen, a self-admitted fan of Limmud, a group dedicated to Jewish learning, says that a "major calling card" of the program is its ability to attract participants from diverse Jewish backgrounds for intensive Jewish study.

Having recently co-authored a study on Limmud International, he said the program's "peoplehood-building element" has become clearer to him.

The Jewish learning festival began 30 years ago in England. Since then, more than 60 communities in 24 countries – among them Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal – have held Limmud events. More than 30,000 people participate in the program annually.

Steven Cohen

"Normally," Cohen said, "when you have people who are intensively studying, they're doing it in their own environment, their own synagogues or camps, among people who are just like them."

A research professor of Jewish social policy at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion and director of the Berman Jewish Policy Archive at New York University, Cohen co-authored The Limmud International Study: Jewish Learning Communities on a Global Scale with Israel-based sociologist Ezra Kopelowitz in late 2011. Almost all the research was performed pro bono "in the spirit of Limmud," it was noted in the study, the first on the subject from an international perspective.

The study, a comparative look at differences between Limmud participants in different countries, includes Canada in a grouping with Argentina, Brazil, Greece, Hong Kong, Mexico, New Zealand and South Africa, that made up 11 per cent of the almost 3,200 respondents (356 people).

Forty-nine communities were represented in the study, including those in Stockholm, Turkey, France, Ukraine and Germany.

The United Kingdom has the largest chunk of respondents at 42 per cent, followed by the United States at 20 per cent.

Cohen, who has participated in two Limmud festivals in England and two in the United States, told The CJN the group of Canada with other countries was based on numbers of respondents.

He said the study made him aware of "Jewish growth" among Europeans whose backgrounds are less conventional from a Jewish standpoint, often because their parents are intermarried or because they don't have many Jewish friends. "They're dealing with a less socially embedded Jewish life."

The study found that European participants were most likely to cite an impact on their Jewish learning and involvement.

In contrast, the study found that American and Israeli "Limmudniks" are more religiously oriented than those in other countries.

A majority of Israeli respondents have presented at Limmud conferences in other countries, leading the researchers to conclude that Israelis are an important resource for Limmud.

Cohen said he was surprised at the diversity of backgrounds and the age range of the respondents. "That type of diversity is very stimulating."

GROWING THINGS: Grade 3 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School – including, from left, Amy B., Jordan H. and Romi B. – took part in an international daffodils and tulips project as part of their studies in the school's Israel Interactive Centre. They planted tulips and daffodils at Bialik, and their peers in countries around the world, including Israel, did the same.

Not all haredim condone actions of harassing kids: family

But her family wants to emphasize that while many in the media are making the story a "Jewish issue, which the world loves, of course," not all haredim conduct themselves this way or condone the actions of those harassing the children.

"It's just a small group of extremists. That has to be clarified. It's not a 'them versus us' situation. We're all Jews. Am Yisrael chai. We're all one," she said.

"These kids just need to be left alone and be part of society. Certainly they should not be terrorized like they have been," she said.

Asked whether her family would consider moving Na'ama to a different school if the attacks continue, Arlene responded "absolutely not."

"Orot is a brand new school that was built for these dati leumi [national religious] Zionist families," she said.

"I don't want this [conflict] to split the Jewish community. It's not all haredim. We all need to stick together as Jews. When something like this happens... when one of our children is affected, all of our children are affected. We all need to stand up for this," Arlene added.

She also noted that Na'ama's family has received support and encouragement from many haredim throughout this affair.

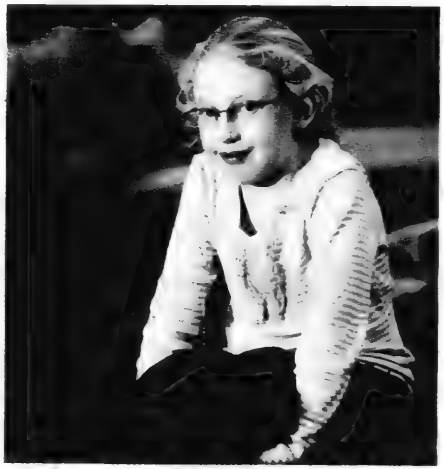
In related news, last week two haredi children said they were attacked in Jerusalem by non-Orthodox Jews in recent days.

An 11-year-old haredi boy filed a complaint with Jerusalem police on Jan. 3 alleging that two non-Orthodox teens attacked him and shouted at him at a bus stop in Jerusalem, and tried to prevent him from getting on the bus because he is haredi.



Na'ama Margolese

Two days earlier, a haredi girl, 11, told police that a non-Orthodox bus passenger on a Jerusalem bus spit at her and pushed her, saying "We will destroy the haredim."

The haredi news website Kikar Hashabbat reportedly opened a hotline for haredi people to report violence against them. It has reportedly received numerous responses.

Only one way to reduce violence

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Just over one month ago, the Toronto Star announced that Toronto "may be the safest it has been in 25 years."

That assessment was based on what one analyst called a "dramatic decline" in the number of murders, from a high of 86 in 2007, to 42 (as of Dec. 1) in 2011.

But statistics are often misleading. While the murder rates have declined over the last four years, the rates remained consistently higher during the previous seven. In the United States, the rates of violent crimes have also declined of late. But over a longer stretch of time, the rates remain alarmingly high. Former U.S. secretary of education William J. Bennett published The Index of Leading Cultural Indicators in 1999, which indicated that there was an alarming 500 per cent increase in violent crimes from 1963 to 1993.

At issue is not simply a matter of how statistics are interpreted. At issue is whether or not people are becoming kinder, nicer, better. Steven Pinker, arguably one of the most respected cognitive psychologists and public intellectuals today, claims in his latest book, The Better Angels of Our Nature, that violence has declined because of what he calls "the civilizing process." This, he says, is a process that has managed to tame the inner demons of violence, domination, vengefulness and brutality, replacing them with the virtues of self-control, empathy, and compassion. Human nature, he insists, is being reformed – even transformed – by the sobering effects of modern society.

Would that this were true! But the sad truth is that people, being people, are always going to be caught between their basest animal urges and their noblest intentions. Only when people choose to follow the latter will they transcend the former. And choice is a function of will power.

What motivates a person to choose wisely and act kindly is not so easily identifiable. Cultural background, environment, peer pressure, genetic disposition, education are all factors. So is religion. A person who feels bound by the religious imperative: "You shall not murder!" is, no doubt, more likely to account for a reduction in the murder rate than someone who does not feel so bound. And a person who sees murder as a sin as much as a crime has a deeper reason to avoid committing murder.

For Jews, the future lies not in relying on "the better angels of nature," or even assuming that we have any. The future lies in teaching and insisting and convincing Jews and non-Jews alike that murder is unequivocally wrong, that a person who commits a murder is considered as if that person had destroyed an entire world, that all human beings are created in God's image and are worthy of dignity and respect. Only when that lesson is learned can we expect to see a permanent decline in murder and violence.

Rabbi Wayne Allen is the provost of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School.

Executive Director
Beth Tikvah Synagogue

Make our house your home. Beth Tikvah Synagogue of Toronto, one of the most dynamic Conservative synagogues in North America, is seeking an Executive Director.

The successful candidate will oversee the administration of a thousand family congregation – one that excels at serving the spiritual, social, and educational needs of its diverse membership.

We're looking for someone with an equally diverse skill set. This is a unique chance to make your mark on a new position, and help lead to Beth Tikvah's successful future. Duties include:

- supervising administration, office and maintenance personnel, financial planning/management, and purchasing;
- assisting synagogue committees in planning and executing their activities;
- assisting in fundraising projects, endowments, and membership campaigns;
- overseeing the implementation and maintenance of information technology/web;
- maintaining a calendar of synagogue activities and religious services, and providing for their implementation;
- participating in volunteer development;
- assisting members in matters relating to life-cycle events and other synagogue needs;
- overseeing synagogue buildings, grounds, security, and cemetery.

The Executive Director reports to the President of Beth Tikvah. He/she serves as the representative of the officers and directors and Board of Governors in administering the affairs of the congregation, and works in partnership with the clergy and lay leaders.

The ideal candidate should have at least seven years in a similar role. Experience in a not-for-profit organization and a degree in business administration/management would be a plus.

If you have the record, vision and passion to take on this exciting leadership opportunity, please send your resume to President@bethtikvahtoronto.org

Lessons of the past

It is that time of the year when I am asked why students of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto should study history and, more specifically, ancient history. It is a fair question in our society, which is geared to business and the professions. This is even truer for us Jews, who tend to guide our children into the practical professions.

It is an understandable tendency on our part, since we wish our children to do well and be financially successful. However, this does not preclude gaining an appreciation for the past and its role in both our personal and collective lives. Sadly, today's world has lost its historical perspective, as the events of the last few years are showing us. Some of these events are relatively recent, while others take us further back in time.

The current financial crisis was partly brought about by the ongoing deregulation of the last few decades. It has allowed a few people to become obscenely wealthy at the expense of the vast majority. Many of the rules that were removed were put in place because of the lessons of the Great Depression of the 1930s. As that disaster faded from public consciousness, so did the rules that were put in place to prevent it from happening again. It is a lesson we forgot with dire consequences.

Politically, we have the lessons from the foreign-policy debacles of Iraq and Afghanistan. Whatever one may think of former prime minister Jean Chrétien, he had the historical foresight to keep us out of the Iraqi quagmire. But because of our treaty obligations, he initially got us involved in Afghanistan, which once again is destabilizing as we extricate our troops from its bloody and war-torn soil.

Past Forward

The problems in Iraq can be traced back to the Paris Peace Conference of 1919, when the Turkish Ottoman Empire had the misfortune to be on the losing side. It was carved up by the victors, primarily Britain and France. It was the British who received the land between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, which was known to the ancients as Mesopotamia and to us as Iraq.

When the Hashemite allies of the British were kicked out of Arabia by the victorious Saud clan, the British created the protectorate of Iraq for one of the Hashemites, while carving Transjordan out of the Palestine Mandate for the other. Neither of these states had a cohesive history to bind them together. Consequently, we are now paying the price for their instability.

The case of Afghanistan takes us further back in time to the conquests of Alexander the Great and his victim, the once mighty Persian Empire, neither of whom could maintain control over this desolate, mountainous and fiercely independent patchwork of hostile tribes.

More recently, the British tried to take it over in the 19th century and were defeated, while the Russians tried to do the same in the 1980s with similar disastrous results. As someone once said, those who do not learn the lessons of the past are doomed to repeat its mistakes.

The power in God and nature

The Torah readings that we're now getting involved with describe a horrible reality in Egypt and the beginnings of the plan for redemption. We're very familiar with the events of Egypt and the steps of Divine salvation that occurs through the upcoming plagues. We engage in the age-old Jewish debate that pits justice against mercy, and we anchor our perspective within the plague texts. We read of our redemptive moments and of the women who affirmed life, regardless of nation, religion or culture.

But one subtle point we don't focus on is the role of nature and its relationship with God.

From the very beginning, with the plague of blood, nature is woven into the plagues. We're so overwhelmed with the description of what's happening that we forget to ask fundamental questions about nature and the plagues. What is the relationship nature has with God? Is God bringing the plagues because God is omniscient or omnipotent?

In other words, if God knows nature is about to do something anyway and God takes advantage of that opportunity and frames a plague around it, God is manifesting an all-knowing, or omniscient, aspect of God's relationship with nature. However, if God is commanding nature to behave in a certain way and nature is obeying the command, God is manifesting an all-powerful, or omnipotent, aspect.

Some people argue the plagues were miraculous in their timing, but nature does these things anyway. This would lead to a more subtle involvement of God in the world, in that God isn't initiating events but is blending Divine interaction with the flow of nature. Others argue that these are grand commandments, and God interacts with creation through commandment and it's our duty to obey. This would lead to a more structured and overt involvement of God in the world.

Midrashic Moments

But why does any of this matter?

One of the fundamental Jewish questions that's often asked is, "Where was God?" Whenever there's a tragedy or crisis, we ask "Where was God?" And while some of us can answer in a way that satisfies us personally, there's no answer that satisfies us nationally.

The breakdown in answering the question lies somewhat in the fact that we didn't understand the question we were asking. If we believe God saves through omniscience, we're looking for different things than if we believe God saves through omnipotence.

We're so focused on the relationship humanity has with God that we neglect to learn of the relationship God has with all creation. And yet learning of that relationship will ultimately help us answer the questions of our heart.

The sages long ago understood this point when they stated that the entire world understood the language of creation and that the whole created world could communicate with each other. Humans are the only creatures that have forgotten this language.

Rachael Turkienicz is director of Rachaelscentre.org.

Offal yes, awful no: chopped liver

Last time, we looked at that oft-enjoyed yet oft-maligned staple of Jewish cooking, chopped liver. Whether this is one of your favourite foods or if you've decided it's time to give it a second chance, you've come to the right place.

If you'd like to try your hand at whipping up some chopped liver from scratch – and want to keep your kitchen kosher at the same time – you need to do some reading first. The raw liver you have just purchased may be kosher but still requires kashering before you can cook with it. Kashering liver is always done by broiling and requires special utensils. This site provides step-by-step information. [http://bit.ly/liver27] Once you've kashered your livers – or purchased kashered livers from your butcher – you are ready to get going.

"It's time for chopped liver to make a comeback." So writes Adam Roberts at amateurgourmet.com. He then does his part by providing a recipe along with a delicious series of photographs. [http://bit.ly/liver16] I note (with some amusement) that this recipe is taken from the book Cooking with the Kosher Butcher's Wife. Title of the chapter: Awesome Offal. [http://bit.ly/liver29]

If you'd like to watch a master at work, you can view the chef at hoffmankitchen cook up a traditional batch of chopped liver in a very good step-by-step video. [http://bit.ly/liver18]

But wait, there's more. The Jewish-Food Chopped Liver archives have 30 variations, including Muriel's Famous, gehakte leber and reduced-calorie (hold the schmaltz!). [http://bit.ly/liver19]

Ah, the schmaltz. Since so many authentic recipes call for this wonderful ingredient, I thought it merits its own paragraph. According to Wikipedia, "Homemade Jewish-style schmaltz is made by cutting chicken or goose fat into small pieces and melting it in a pan over low to moderate heat, generally with onions. After the majority of the fat has been extracted, the melted fat is strained through a cheesecloth into a storage container." Yum. [http://bit.ly/liver20]

Although chopped liver is high in protein, it also doesn't stint on the fat or cholesterol, either. But vegetarian and meatless "mock" chopped-liver recipes abound. Walnuts are often a key ingredient, along with:

- Green beans and peas [http://bit.ly/liver21]
- Lentils [http://bit.ly/liver22]
- or Mushrooms [http://bit.ly/liver28]

And for something different, there's Orange Salmon Pâté. [http://bit.ly/liver24]

New York Times food writer Mark Bittman grew up eating chopped liver but has hungered for a traditional, creamy pâté. In order to achieve that goal, Bittman admits his use of butter instead of chicken fat may have his grandmother spinning in her grave. Since I'd prefer to not add to her spinning, I say thank goodness for Jewish cuisine writer Joan Nathan. [http://bit.ly/liver25]

Nathan writes, also in the Times, "For a long time I thought that all chopped-liver recipes were essentially the same. Then someone shared this tasty French recipe, the perfect start to a dinner at Chanukah or on any other special occasion. French Jews took lowly chopped liver and turned it into pâté by passing it through a food mill, adding a little brandy and corn or potato starch and then pouring it into a terrine that they baked in a bain-marie (water bath) and cooled. [http://bit.ly/liver26]

"Voilà: completely kosher chopped-liver pâté."

March grad starts anti-genocide group

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Joseph Rothstein, a Grade 12 student at York Mills Collegiate Institute, credits his participation in last April's March of the Living for motivating him to start a group called "We're All Human."

"The entire message of the trip was to do something afterward," said Rothstein, 17, the chief founder and president of the group.

He said it was "very tough" visiting concentration camps and mass graves in Poland before he and fellow participants headed to Israel to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut. "I learned from that."

On his return home, Rothstein, who has worked at Camp Walden and is a baseball umpire for 10-to-15-year-olds, asked himself what he could do to help his community "and stop this from happening again."

He decided to start We're All Human to educate young teens about racism and the importance of "embracing our differences.

"We talk about how racism has affected us in the past 100 years – we give examples of different genocides and atrocities, such as the holocaust in Rwanda and Darfur."

As well, a PowerPoint presentation details how genocides start. "There's a joke or a racist comment, and it escalates from there. We explain how they can stop it.

"We really try to get [students] to get involved and try to inspire them like I was inspired."

His friends and classmates Miles Resnick, Chris Phillips and Dylan Johnston work with him, and all of them take part in presentations. As well, they post frequently on the group's Facebook page.

Recently, they spoke to 170 Grade 9 students at Windfields Junior High School.

Since the group's initial presentation at York Mills, We're All Human has made presentations to a dozen classes at three schools.

Rothstein, who wants to study commerce in university next year, would like to continue his involvement with We're All Human after he graduates from high school.

"Right now, I'm focusing on promoting this while I'm still in Toronto. I'm not quite sure what's going to happen to it next year. It's not just going to dissolve."

EBook lays out Jews' legal claim to Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's a common misconception that the State of Israel was created as a result of the UN partition resolution of November 1947.

Not so, says a researcher and author of a new electronic book (eBook) on the subject. In fact, said Salomon Benzimra, that General Assembly resolution, like all GA resolutions, was not binding and had no effect in law. The legal basis for the creation of the modern State of Israel goes back to the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which was adopted by the Allied powers that defeated the Ottoman Turks in World War I and which allocated Ottoman territories, including today's Israel and the West Bank, at the San Remo conference, through the Treaty of Sevres and through a subsequent League of Nations mandate.

The international community recognized the exclusive right of the Jewish People to sovereignty over captured Ottoman territories known as Palestine and enshrined that recognition in international law, said Benzimra, author of The Jewish People's Right to the Land of Israel.

"That right has never been revoked," he said, though British authorities, who were given a Mandate (trusteeship) over Palestine, carved off huge portions of the land – today's Jordan – and handed it to their Arab allies.

Benzimra said little is known of this history and of the legal rights of the Jewish People to the land. His eBook, he said is intended "to fight against untruths, against distortions of reality and to bring out factual events related to history that are ignored in diplomacy, everywhere."

The Jewish People's Rights to the Land of Israel was published recently as an eBook, a digital, downloadable book available at Amazon.com. At 100 pages in length and richly illustrated, it is intended to be accessible to anyone. It is extensively footnoted, allowing readers to click on hyperlinks and read the original source material to verify the author's findings.

A Hebrew translation of the book was offered to the government of Israel as an educational resource for graduating high school students. Moshe Ya'alon, minister for strategic affairs and deputy prime minister, was receptive to the offer, and it was slated to officially launch during Yom Ha'atzmaut 2011, but "logistics concerns" postponed the release, said Goldi Steiner, co-founder of Canadians for Israel's Legal Rights (CILR), a grassroots organization that is promoting the eBook and seeking international support for Israel's legal rights.

Steiner hopes the eBook will one day be made available to youngsters in Israeli schools, as well as to students attending Canadian Jewish schools, particularly those about to enter university. Being armed with the facts would make them better prepared to face the barrage of anti-Israel misinformation they're likely to encounter on campus, she said.

Benzimra believes Israel's hesitancy to adopt the book may be due to efforts to "appease the Arabs," "remain on good terms with Europe and America and not create too much upheaval of the Oslo process."

But Benzimra, a chemical engineer by profession, feels "there will be no peace unless basic facts are understood." And those facts clearly substantiate the Jewish People's legal rights to all the territory west of the Jordan River, including the lands Palestinians want for a state.

Under the treaties, documents and declarations that set out the legal basis for a Jewish state, Arabs were limited to civil and religious rights. "What Arabs don't have in Palestine are national, political rights… Palestine was reserved as a reconstituted state for the Jewish People," he said.

Palestinians could only obtain a state if a treaty with Israel creates one, he added.

The ebook contains numerous interesting revelations that contradict the accepted wisdom about the region.

One such item is the Arab claim they have been inhabitants of the land for untold generations. Benzimra, however, notes that Britain's 1930 Hope-Simpson report, which was supposed to examine Palestine's ability to absorb Jewish immigrants, found that British authorities were turning a blind eye to widespread illegal Arab immigration from Syria, Transjordan and Egypt. That was occurring at a time when Arab opponents of Jewish immigration were arguing the Jewish presence was impoverishing the local Arab population – but apparently not enough to keep their fellow Arabs from streaming into the country to share their fellow Arabs' misery, quipped the then governor of Sinai.

Citing other sources, the eBook notes that in just a few months in 1934, 30,000 Syrians entered the territory. The book also quotes U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt saying in 1939 that since 1921, Arab immigration to Palestine far exceeded Jewish immigration.

Steiner, a longstanding community volunteer, particularly in support of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, said CILR plans to make the book known to "political/diplomatic circles, the media, academia, and simultaneously… a Hebrew version. We hope to provide the multitudes of thus far uninformed Israeli public at large with the facts of their legal rights."

Kosher cheeses recalled voluntarily

JTA

For the first time in its 110-year history, the World Cheese Company, producer of Haolam and Miller's kosher cheese products, has issued a voluntary recall of some shredded cheese.

The recall comes after a packaging facility in Wisconsin that handles the shredding and packaging, not the production, of some of Miller's shredded products also packaged a different company's cheese that was found to contain the deadly bacteria listeria monocytogenes.

Kosher products packaged in the same plant all tested negative for the bacteria.

According to World Cheese, the state of Wisconsin requested the voluntary recall of all the products shredded in the plant following the discovery of the bacteria.

The recalled cheeses are all eight-ounce and 16-ounce bags of Haolam and Miller's shredded cheese (pizza, mozzarella, cheddar, fancy, muenster, R/F muinster, R/F cheddar) with an expiration of June 5, 2012, through Sept. 4, 2012; all 32-ounce bags of Haolam shredded mozzarella and gourmet blend and Miller's shredded mozzarella with an expiration date of Feb. 6, 2012, through May 7, 2012; all five-pound bags of Haolam and Miller's shredded mozzarella, cheddar, muenster and Monterey Jack with a package date of Sept. 8, 2011, through Dec. 7, 2011.

A company news release said that there was no health danger to people who consumed the listed products.

"Despite the fact that the products that we are being instructed to voluntarily recall, after having been tested, were found to be negative for the listeria monocytogenes, Haolam is complying with the state of Wisconsin's voluntary recall and removing all of the products from store shelves."

The release said the recall is not a kashrut issue.

Jennifer Bland, who works in file maintenance at Sobey's in the Spring Farm Plaza, Thornhill, said the store does carry the affected cheeses, and it has all been pulled from shelves.

Anyone who has the cheese at home can bring it in for a refund, she said.

World Cheese said that fresh cheese will be in stores shortly, and is being produced in a new shredding and packaging facility "where we have exclusive control over the cheese that is brought into the facility."

My Cooking Class books demystify baking and cooking

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

To the uninitiated, baking and cooking can be a mystifying and intimidating exercise.

It needn't be so, especially if you consult the My Cooking Class series, published by Firefly Books.

Taking an innovative approach, these books present recipes in complete visual sequences, with every ingredient shown in the correct quantity and in the exact order in which it will be used.

If you faithfully follow the instructions, you'll learn to be a baker or a cook in no time at all.

The latest batch of books from My Cooking Class will not only teach neophytes the essentials, but will help seasoned hands upgrade their skills.

Cake Basics, by Abi Fawcett, teaches you the fundamentals of baking, telling you how to whip up simple cakes, layer cakes, loaf cakes, chocolate cakes and cheesecakes.

Pick and choose from 70 recipes, running the gamut from a butter cake and a classic fruit cake to a lemon and poppyseed cake to a coconut and rum cheese cake.

These recipes shmeck.

Indian Basics, by Jody Vassallo, contains 85 mouthwatering recipes for soups and snacks, dals and vegetables, meat, chicken and fish, breads and rice, chutneys, pickles and salads and desserts and drinks.

Vassallo lists 32 spices integral to Indian cuisine, from black onion seeds and green cardamom pods to white cloves and ground coriander.

Once you're ready to cook up a storm, you can make, for example, garlic ginger eggplant, lamb korma, saffron rice, vegetable pilaf, Goan fish and vermicelli pudding.

Preserving Basics, by the same author, is a primer on making homemade preserves such as jams, jellies, marmalades, mustards, chutneys and relishes.

Preserving fruits and vegetables in the form of jam and other preserves is an art that can be mastered, and in this volume, you'll learn how to make such delicacies as raspberry and lavender jam, pineapple and peppercorn jam, rhubarb and strawberry jam, pomegranate jelly, grapefruit marmalade, garlic and parsley mustard and fig, pear and pepper chutney.

Serve these preserves and impress your guests.

The architect's rendition of the proposed NYCTech Campus on Roosevelt Island.

Technion, Cornell to form new school

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

JERUSALEM — The Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa will team with Cornell University to establish NYCTech, a new school of applied engineering in New York.

The proposal from the two schools was chosen by New York from submissions made by seven competing international institutions.

The campus for 2,000 students will be built on New York City's Roosevelt Island using $100 million in municipal funds and $350 million from Charles F. Feeny of Duty Free Shoppers that will pay for the first phase of the building project.

The goal is to turn the Big Apple into the next Silicon Valley by leveraging the expertise and reputation of both schools. The Technion, often referred to as the MIT of Israel, is known worldwide for its engineering innovations and technology transfer successes. Its faculty includes three Nobel laureates.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg announced the selection of the winning proposal at a press conference Dec. 19 at the Weill Cornell Medical College in Manhattan. Technion president Peretz Lavie, who flew to New York for the event, stated that NYCTech is not meant be a branch of either school, but an entirely new and different sort of institution.

"I stand before you with great excitement and pride," Lavie said. "I just returned from Stockholm, where our Prof. Dan Shechtman was awarded the Nobel Prize in chemistry. My excitement today is no less than my excitement was there."

He added that the Technion is in the midst of celebrating the 100th anniversary of the laying of its cornerstone, which was made possible by the support of New York philanthropist Jacob Schiff.

"Today I feel that we are closing a 100-year circle, a circle of a partnership between New York and Haifa," Lavie said.

Bloomberg described the project as "transformative."

"Of all the applications we received, Cornell and Technion's was the boldest and most ambitious," he said

Cornell president David Skorton said NYCTech is expected to "fuel the city's growing tech sector" by generating jobs, startup companies and commercialized inventions.

The school is expected to open for the 2012-2013 academic year in temporary quarters while construction of the 2.1 million-square-foot, environmentally friendly campus gets underway. It is expected to include classrooms, science laboratories, a conference centre, housing and other facilities powered, at least in part, by solar energy and geothermal wells.

Israeli Consul General Ido Aharoni called the new partnership "more than just a collaboration between organizations, but rather an alliance of leading young minds."

Robbins Hebrew Academy is the Best Choice in Jewish Education

This year, Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) is celebrating 50 years of excellence in Jewish education. RHA is the first Jewish day school in Ontario to be granted candidate status for the national organization, Canadian Accredited Independent Schools (CAIS). CAIS schools are recognized for their excellence in education, innovative goals, stellar staff, administration, and sound financial governance. Becoming an accredited member of CAIS would place RHA among the best schools in the country.

11 standards for CAIS accreditation

RHA has been recognized for its high standards of Jewish education and been granted the opportunity to build on its accomplishments. To become accredited, schools must meet 11 standards. These include Vision, Mission, Values and Strategy; Co-Curriculum and Learning Environment; Academic Program; School Leadership; Human Resources; School and Community; Admission Procedures; Governance; Finance; Physical Plant, Health and Safety and Commitment to School Improvement.

Anne-Marie Kee, Executive Director of CAIS said, "I firmly believe that accreditation in Canada is about school improvement, but it is also an opportunity to celebrate what is done well."

RHA has an always-improving teaching philosophy that is "made to measure" to the students' needs in these changing times. Claire Sumerlus, Head of School at RHA said, "it is a challenge that we are poised to meet. We stand upon our achievements, but we also welcome the opportunity to strive for the improvements necessary to place us among Canada's most excellent schools."

A learning experience unmatched by Toronto Jewish Day Schools

One of the advantages of accreditation, according to CAIS, is that "accreditation assures parents and the public that the school is focused on providing a safe and enriching environment while maintaining an efficient and effective operation."

RHA strives to offer an enriching learning experience that is unmatched among Toronto Jewish Day Schools. According to Ms. Sumerlus, "it is our commitment to continuous innovation and a view of our children's world in a global context that makes our approach to education unique."

The philosophies of CAIS schools are to create an environment where learning really happens. As Anne-Marie Kee said, "all CAIS schools are full of passionate learners" and both RHA and Judaism promote this passion for learning. Sumerlus further explains, "we strive to give our students a passion for life-long learning and to develop in them the ability to critically evaluate their world."

RHA teachers and staff understand the importance of creativity, collaboration and innovation in developing students to be successful in the 21st century and under the leadership of Ms. Sumerlus, the teachers and staff are expected to meet these high standards of teaching each and every day.

To learn more about why CAIS accreditation would make RHA the best choice in Jewish education for your child, contact RHA's Director of Admissions, Michele Viner at 416-224-8737 ext. 137, or visit www.rhacademy.ca.

Robbins Hebrew Academy is celebrating 50 years of excellence in Jewish education

RHA's 50th Birthday celebrations will include a Gala Dinner and a Shabbat Dinner in March. "We are looking forward to connecting with our alumni and community to celebrate this milestone," said Sumerlus. For details on the 50th birthday celebrations visit: www.rhacademy.ca/birthday.

Mediator helps divorcing couples put kids first

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Howard Irving is trying to take the sting out of divorce.

A founding member and past president of Family Mediation Canada, the social worker and family mediator is the author of six books, including his newest, Children Come First: Mediation, Not Litigation When Marriage Ends.

Originally from Providence, R.I., Irving, who came to Toronto to get his PhD in social work, said he was always interested in marital and family therapy, "but I found that people who couldn't reconcile, went on to a divorce that was handled by lawyers.

"That is not always good, though, because there is a win-lose scenario. That may work in criminal and corporate law, but not in family law, because kids have an ongoing relationship with their parents," said Irving, who has taught mediation at Tel Aviv University and in Hong Kong.

A major difficulty in family law, he said, is that the problems brought by families are frequently not legal problems. "They are human problems in which the law is involved.

"Voluntary settlements, which are worked out on an emotional and intellectual level, are more humane than those forced by litigation. Decisions reached by mutual agreement mean that neither party is the loser."

In the 1980s, Irving said, mediation was not being practised here, but he did some research and discovered that it was being practised in Los Angeles. "I spent six months there, came back to Toronto, and started Family Mediation Canada."

Howard Irving

Mediation, he said, is a process in which an impartial third party helps families identify and clarify issues between them and assists them to reach agreement on some or all of these issues.

"Family mediation does not deal with fault, find blame, give legal advice, or make decisions for others. It is not at all like family counselling. When people come for mediation, they have already decided to separate. [By that time], only about 10 per cent reconcile," he said.

In Children Come First, he said, he teaches parents who are going through a divorce, to put their children first. "Mediation can help [parties] maintain shared parenting, which means the parental bond is maintained even though the marital bond has ended."

In a clear and concise manner, Irving teaches parents – he gives a number of examples – how the mediation process works, gives guidelines for creating shared parenting plans, and talks about financial issues.

"Mediation is starting to get very well known. At first, couples came in after being referred by lawyers. Now many are coming in on their own.

"Divorce could be the perfect storm. All the right conditions could come together in order to create family suffering. With mediation, families can reach agreements on most of their issues."

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

I did it! It took a lot of hard work and determination, but I did it! I avoided my third back surgery! It took a year, but I am back to exercising regularly and doing what I love!

It all started in December 2010: I was working out in my gym when I ripped my right hamstring (back of the leg) during an exercise. I heard a sound, felt the pain and had to stop exercising. I lay down, raised my leg and put ice on it, but by the next day it was worse.

I went to my doctor's office, but my doctor wasn't there. So I saw someone else, who misdiagnosed me and told me it was my sciatic nerve. I left his office slightly confused, but I went to a chiropractor for treatment.

After two weeks of regular treatment, I continued to get worse. I went back to my doctor, who gave me the right diagnosis – a badly torn right hamstring. He recommended a physiotherapy clinic.

I started physiotherapy in mid-January, but my physiotherapist didn't believe my hamstring tear was the problem and insisted on treating me for a back injury rather than a leg injury.

I continued to get worse. During this phase, I kept going back to my doctor, not understanding why I wasn't getting any relief.

He ordered an MRI. I had to wait a month.

By March, I was on heavy painkillers regularly, just to be able to function, and I spent every spare minute in bed, away from my family. I was having flashbacks to 1998, when I spent six weeks on my floor unable to move, waiting for my first back surgery.

I repeatedly asked my physiotherapist to treat my leg, and he refused, telling me it was my back causing the pain in my leg, not the other way around. Then my doctor told me the MRI results showed a re-herniation of L5 disc, right side, and I had to see a surgeon. I told him I wasn't having a third back surgery. He referred me to Dr. Rebecca Henry.

Senior overcomes adversity

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Gerald Ziedenberg, 72, gets his inspiration from the English prime minister Winston Churchill.

"I never give up," said Ziedenberg, a retired pharmacist, and author of a memoir, Inspiration Through Adversity.

Gerald Zieenberg

Born with an arm defect known as Erb's palsy, Ziedenberg, is a husband, father and grandfather, who had a long career with Shoppers Drug Mart, and kept active running marathons and often bicycling more than 100 miles a day.

"Just as I was approaching retirement, though, I [was struck with] osteoarthritis," he said. After six major surgeries on his hip and back, "compounded by my arm defect, [I] had to curtail all physical activities.

"I had to give everything up and transform my life," he added. "It was a sea change. At first I would start to cry when I saw people running."

Always passionate about history, Ziedenberg said he went into pharmacy to make a living. "Like most children of immigrant parents, that was the priority."

Needing to find a new outlet, he enrolled at the University of Toronto and eventually earned bachelor's and master's degrees in history. "I had lived through a lot of the things we discussed in class."

Although his parents were not Holocaust survivors, he said, they both lost their families in the war.

He loved studying, he said. "I went to class with a walker, in a wheelchair and with canes – whatever it took. I was determined not to give up."

He received his bachelor's degree in 2003, he said, and then had surgery. "It took my three sons to get me to my graduation, but I got there. The university provided a lift for me to get onto the stage.

"My oldest son teaches at U of T part time, so he was able to 'hood' me. Parents often hood their children at a graduation, but not usually the opposite. It was certainly a special moment I'll always cherish."

It took him about 1-1/2 years to write his memoir by longhand, he said. The last chapter is a reprint of his master's thesis, titled The Successful Integration of Holocaust Survivors into Postwar Canada, 1945-1955.

"I've written another book, Blockade: The Story of Jewish Immigration to Palestine: 1933-1948, and am now working on a third book about epic trials in Jewish history."

In Florida for the winter, Ziedenberg teaches a class in modern history at Florida Gulf Coast University. "I give 30 lectures over the winter. I used to spend my time in Florida bicycling. Now I do this

"So many people face problems. They need to occupy themselves and not give up. Just keep going."

Philanthropist founded Camp Wahanowin

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Harold Nashman, founder of Camp Wahanowin and Jewish community philanthropist, died Dec. 31 in Florida. He was 84.

In a eulogy, Rabbi Ahron Hoch of the Village Shul referred to Nashman as his teacher, mentor, friend and "partner in idealism" for the past 30 years. "He was humble, brilliant and multi-talented," the rabbi said.

Referring to Nashman's early support of Aish HaTorah, Rabbi Hoch thanked him for "believing in five 20-something crazy idealists 30 years ago."

A father of five and grandfather of 15, the Toronto-born lawyer, who retired after five years in practice, founded Camp Wahanowin in 1955.

His sons, Alon and Bruce, who is now director of the Orillia camp, spoke in separate eulogies of their father's gift for making speeches.

"Harold always found the words which celebrated the best of what was going on," Alon said. "And everyone in the room felt taller, acknowledged, appreciated and loved. He never made notes."

Harold Nashman

Nashman had a long history of health problems, beginning with a massive heart attack at age 31. It left him with "a sunny attitude wedded to a total appreciation of each day," Alon said.

His medical history included sextuple bypass surgery, kidney failure, cirrhosis, diabetes and cancer, and a broken neck three years ago, from which he recovered. Two weeks before his death, he fell and broke a hip.

But, Alon said, "He seemed to be able to turn every 'oy' into joy."

Before his career as a camp director, Nashman's leadership skills came into play as social convenor of Osgoode Hall Law School, and in his involvement with his fraternity and with Hillel. He also served as a writer for the UC Follies at the University of Toronto.

At Wahanowin, Nashman and his late wife, Yetta, created "a safe and loving environment in which young people could grow," Alon said, recalling his dad's role as a father figure to many.

In the past 30 years, Nashman emerged as a major fundraiser after his son, Bruce, spent a summer at Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem, Alon said.

Nashman was involved in setting up a Toronto branch of the Orthodox Jewish outreach organization and developed a funding model – a free community lecture sponsored by donors – that has since been widely copied, Alon said. "He never considered himself a macher, but he gave as if he was one."

In addition to the Village Shul, Nashman supported initiatives in Israel and eventually, the Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute, a project of the Village Shul and the Aish HaTorah Learning Centre.

As well, he played a central role in the development of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and co-wrote a song called The Power of Peace, which became an anthem for Care International and was recorded by Aretha Franklin and Enrique Iglesias.

Nashman's son, Bruce, recalled his father's knack for coining original words, his sense of fun, and his comfort with people from all walks of life – from Orthodox to secular, and including major figures like Elie Wiesel and Israeli prime ministers.

Nashman was predeceased by his wife, Yetta. He is survived by children, Alon, Bruce, Mark, Laura and Danny; his sister, Rina Fishbein; his partner, Bella Hull, and 15 grandchildren.

Rabbi reaches out to cemetery vandals

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — After five graves were vandalized with swastikas at Victoria's 150-year-old Emanu-El Jewish cemetery on New Year's Eve, Rabbi Harry Brechner felt compelled to respond with a letter directed to the vandal.

"I know that the vast majority of people living in Victoria… find this kind of act repulsive and cowardly," the spiritual leader of the historic Congregation Emanu-El wrote in a letter published in local media outlets, including the Victoria Times-Colonist. "Acts of hate have no place in our community."

Rabbi Brechner invited the culprit to "take ownership and responsibility" for his or her actions and "make things right."

Gravestone vandalized

"Come clean the grave sites, and when you are through take a tour with me around the cemetery and meet some of the people buried there who defied Nazism. People who lived, worked towards positive change and loved after losing all they held dear in the Holocaust. Come meet the people who lived their lives after the Holocaust as the antithesis of your swastika."

Rabbi Brechner told The CJN that he "never really expected anyone to come forward, but we've had enormous support from the community."

He said he's been contacted by local MPs and MLAs, as well as the mayor, city councillors and just about every faith leader in the area.

"People have stopped me in the streets," he said: "One man brought pickles, chocolates and kosher wine to the synagogue to comfort the community, while another offered us a log cabin in the mountains as a retreat if anyone feels the need to use it."

Six days after the vandalism was discovered, the graves had been cleaned, and minor repairs were slated to be completed this week. Rabbi Brechner said he hoped that a vigil at the cemetery scheduled for Jan. 8 would give community members a sense of closure. "There was a sense that people needed to gather out of respect and solidarity," he said.

"For me, it's so important that the children in the community who are old enough and aware enough will come to the vigil and see that the person who did this is outside the [norm] and not part of the community of Victoria. I want them to be reassured about the security of the Victoria's Jewish community."

Victoria police are treating the incident as a hate crime but were unable to comment by The CJN's deadline.

The last act of antisemitic vandalism in Victoria occurred in May 2010, when vandals painted graffiti in Victoria's Clawthorpe Park and defaced a wall facing the parking lot at the Victoria Jewish Community Centre.

TV host's anti-Israel comments cause outrage

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has asked for a meeting with the head of a Quebec television network because of a program host's repeated expressions of "animosity and prejudice with regard to the Jewish community."

On Dec. 23, CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro wrote to Maxime Rémillard, co-president and chief executive officer of Remstar Corporation, which owns V Television, about its concerns over Stéphane Gendron, co-host of the talk show Face à Face.

Stéphane Gendron

CIJA made the letter public following remarks made by Gendron on the Dec. 27 program in which he said of Israel: "[A] country like that does not deserve to exist" and, "unfortunately, Israel has not yet collapsed."

CIJA said it has yet to receive a response to the letter from V, a private, over-the-air French-language station.

Gendron made the remarks during a "tribute" to Quebec member of the National Assembly Amir Khadir for his support of the boycott of Boutique Le Marcheur shoe store on St. Denis Street because it sells a line of Israeli-made shoes.

The sole Québec Solidaire MNA took part in one of the pickets outside the store in December 2010 and blocked debate on an otherwise all-party motion in the National Assembly condemning the boycott campaign against the store.

Gendron, who in addition to his hosting duties serves as mayor of the small town of Huntingdon, also accused Israel of imposing apartheid and of "stealing" land from the Palestinians.

Del Negro charged that Gendron has engaged in "constant incitement" against Jews and Israel on air.

As egregious as his comments have been over many months, "Stéphane Gendron has now gone too far in affirming that Israel does not have the right to exist," said Del Negro.

In his letter to Rémillard, he pointed out that Gendron's "incitement" does not fall within the realm of opinion as set out in the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council code.

"Under the pretext of criticizing Israel, your host conveys the oldest antisemitic clichés," Del Negro wrote.

He added that Gendron was dismissed from TQS, as V was known before its present ownership, in 2006 for remarks that its management at the time deemed unacceptable.

The pro-Israel media watchdog HonestReporting Canada was also appalled by Gendron's latest outburst, a video clip of which it posted on YouTube.

Executive director Mike Fegelman is especially disappointed because HonestReporting raised objections about Gendron with V's management when he made anti-Israel comments in November.

In that instance, Gendron accused Israel of avenging the Palestinians' admission to UNESCO by "build[ing] 2,000 homes in areas that do not belong to them, the occupied territories, so they are going to bulldoze people, kill people."

V communications director Diane Patenaude told The CJN Jan. 5 that a meeting is scheduled for this week between the station's management and the Face à Face production team. Gendron has been invited to the meeting.

"We take this complaint very seriously," she said, adding that she's answering all the communication the station has received about Gendron's latest comments, and there has been a considerable amount.

She said Rémillard has been on vacation, and that's why CIJA's letter to him had not been acknowledged.

Patenaude said she expected to meet with Rémillard this past Monday on CIJA's request for a meeting.

"Face à Face is a daily public affairs show that deals with numerous issues, and is intended to provoke debate and discussion," Patenaude said. "It is not a newscast or news magazine, and the co-hosts [Gendron and Caroline Proulx] are not journalists. The views they and their guests express are not necessarily those of the network or its management."

While V does not think it is responsible for everything it broadcasts, Patenaude said management will insist from now on that "when an issue is discussed, both sides are presented."

Patenaude gave a similar response after Gendron's remarks in November. She added at the time that the show's producers were reminded of the need to adhere to Canadian broadcast standards "to avoid repeating a similar occurrence."

This lack of a reprimand from his superiors appears to have "emboldened" Gendron to make further anti-Israel comments, Fegelman said.

"V Television continues to allow itself to be a platform for the dissemination of Gendron's hateful invective."

Neither a retraction nor apology was issued on Face à Face.

Fegelman said V is responsible for the information it broadcast, regardless of the type of program.

HonestReporting has now turned to the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council for redress.

"We reiterate our call for a public apology from V Television and for Stéphane Gendron to be immediately terminated as TV host of Face à Face," Fegelman said.

The Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center has also expressed its outrage at Gendron's remarks.

"His views are shared by the likes of Hamas, the Muslim Brotherhood and Iran's ruling mullatocracy and its president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has called for the annihilation of the only true democracy in the Middle East," wrote the Wiesenthal Center's associate dean, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, in a Dec. 30 letter to Rémillard.

"It is dangerously naive and irresponsible not to believe that such escalating rhetoric – left unchallenged by V Television – could impact intergroup relations in Quebec."

Debate revived over faith-based school funding

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

An announcement by the province of Saskatchewan that it will extend public funding to private religious schools has reinvigorated calls by the Jewish community in Ontario to have this province follow suit.

The Dec. 21 announcement by Education Minister Donna Harpauer applied to "qualified independent schools" that adhere to "a strict set of criteria to be eligible for funding of 50 per cent of the provincial per-student average."

Ira Walfish

Ira Walfish, chair of Ontario's Multifaith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith Based Schools, has been pushing for a similar arrangement for Jewish, Muslim, Hindu and other religious schools in Ontario for almost a decade.

He said he and his supporters in the Jewish community are not done pressuring Premier Dalton McGuinty on the issue and are feeling emboldened by Saskatchewan's stance.

"Obviously we still believe strongly that this is the direction Ontario should be taking. Providing parents with choice, be it a public school or a Catholic school or a Jewish, Muslim, Greek Orthodox school etcetera... will ultimately both improve Ontario's school system and remedy a longstanding discriminatory practice, providing funding to one religious group, Catholics, and to exclude all other religions," Walfish said.

In order for religious schools in Saskatchewan to qualify, they must, among other things, participate in the province's student assessment program; employ only certified teachers; teach the provincial curriculum; operate as an incorporated non-profit organization; submit financial statements; have been in operation for at least two consecutive years; facilitate inspection and supervision by ministry officials, and comply with ministry policy and directives.

Saskatchewan's Education Act allows for the registration of "independent schools" by private groups or organizations in order to give parents the ability to "educate their children in accordance with their conscientious beliefs and provide them with a legitimate exemption from attendance at a public or separate school," according to the province.

An estimated 2,000 Jews live in Saskatchewan, but there are currently no Jewish day schools in the province.

In 2001, the Tory government under then-premier Mike Harris introduced a tax credit for private school tuition, which the McGuinty government repealed in 2003.

The funding issue was central to the 2007 Ontario election, when then-Conservative leader John Tory made the promise to fund faith-based schools a major part of his campaign. It was seen as a key reason he lost to McGuinty, who was vocal in his opposition to the idea.

The Constitution Act of 1867 enshrined public funding for Catholic schools in Ontario in order to protect its Catholic minority. The Ontario government has said it has no plans to change its position or open up a constitutional debate on the matter.

Gary Wheeler, a spokesperson for Ontario's Ministry of Education, told The CJN the subject is closed.

Christians flourish in Israel, dwindle under Islam

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While the number of Christians worldwide continues to climb –there are now about 2.2 billion – their communities throughout the Islamic world are besieged by the rising tide of extremism. The consequence has been a steep decline of Christianity in many countries overseas.

An editorial, "Christians and lions," in the Dec. 31 issue of the Economist gave a partial summary of this state of affairs: "In Nigeria scores of Christians have died in Islamist bomb attacks, targeting Christmas prayers. In Iran and Pakistan Christians are on death row, for 'apostasy' – quitting Islam – or blasphemy. Dozens of churches in Indonesia have been attacked or shut. Two-thirds of Iraq's pre-war Christian population have fled. In Egypt and Syria, where secular despots gave Christianity a shield of sorts, political upheaval and Muslim zeal threaten ancient Christian groups."

While the plight of Egypt's Christian community in the post-Mubarak period has received a fair amount of media attention under the glare cast on the "Arab Spring," the often dire situation of Christians in the other countries mentioned above, not to mention China, has either been underreported or largely ignored.

Drawing upon a recent PEW Center study, the Economist noted that in sub-Saharan Africa, Christians have gone from nine per cent to 63 per cent of the total population. Yet, speaking of an underreported story, in Nigeria over the past decade, hundreds of Christians living mainly in the south have been killed in clashes with Muslim radicals from the north. On Christmas Day, an Islamist sect known as Boka Haram (meaning "western education forbidden," according to a New York Times report) claimed responsibility for a series of church bombings, including one that killed 25 in the capital, Abuja. A few days later, with violence unabated, the president of Nigeria declared a state of emergency in a substantial part of the country.

Perhaps this is to be expected from the influential British-based Economist, but while focusing mainly on Islamist intolerance, it also found a role for Israelis in the persecution of Christians: "In the Holy Land, local churches are caught between Israeli encroachment on their property and Islamist bids to monopolize Palestinian life. Followers of Jesus may yet become a rarity in his homeland."

Now, facts may be boring, yet they're often instructive, especially when essential ones are omitted. What's missing above is any mention of a specific example of alleged Israeli encroachment on church property.

In late 1999, Israel was accused of allowing such an infringement when it appeared that the government was prepared to yield to Muslim demands to permit the construction of a mosque next to the famous Christian pilgrimage site, the Basilica of the Annunciation. The Basilica, the largest church in the Middle East, is located in Nazareth, where Muslim Arabs now outnumber Christian Arabs two to one. The Vatican raised strong objections with Israel, which found itself in the middle of a battle between two faiths it has sought to accommodate, if not mollify.

Israel's efforts to reach a compromise by allowing the building of a small mosque while leaving land for a plaza between that structure and the church failed to placate church officials. Negotiations continued until Israel decided in early 2002 to stop the construction of the mosque, an act that pleased the Christians, but led Muslims to accuse Israel of "persecution." A year later, Israel demolished the foundation of the mosque (which had never received a building permit in the first place).

In short, not only was Israel's initial response not an act of "encroachment" on church property, this entire episode illustrates the extent to which Israel has attempted to be sensitive to the religious traditions and demands of both Christians and Muslims, and occasionally finds itself in an untenable situation as a result.

There is one other fact that the Economist omitted, and it's crucial. While Christian populations are declining everywhere in the Middle East, there is one exception: Israel. Only in the Jewish State are Christians not only safe, their numbers are actually increasing. But that makes for rather boring news, doesn't it?

Question: I'm writing because I was married and divorced outside of Canada (both events were in the United States). Do I still need to go through the same process as people who married in Canada and divorced elsewhere when I remarry? Or can I just apply directly for a marriage license because both events happened outside the country?

Answer: You can apply directly to the Registrar of Ontario for an Ontario marriage license application that you must take to a competent family law lawyer. That lawyer must give you a "legal opinion" in a form prescribed by the Ontario government that certifies that you were domiciled in the jurisdiction that granted you the foreign divorce for at least one year prior to the commencement of the Divorce Proceedings in the foreign court. Otherwise, you could have simply flown to Las Vegas and obtained a weekend divorce. A lawyer will charge you a fee for such an opinion since he or she has to verify your identity, examine your passport and proof of domicile in that foreign jurisdiction for at least one year. He then also has to complete the Ontario legal opinion, which must be completed in a particular format. You then file that opinion with the rest of your marriage application to obtain the Ontario marriage license.

Question: My husband has custody of the baby. He is denying me access if I don't give him money. We have no court documents on access but my lawyer is working on that. Is there any way that I can get custody of my child? I have been accused of assault of my stepdaughter; the CAS is involved. My husband is a former drug addict who only quit last year, and he is abusive towards me. CAS gave me unsupervised access to my daughter. They told my lawyer they have no concerns about me having the baby.

Answer: Cases like this involve a spaghetti of conflicting allegations of abuse, especially when child protection workers are involved. Normally, the Ontario Court of Justice first hears from the Children's Aid Society to see if there is any merit to any of the abuse allegations before the same court or the Superior Court of Justice entertains any custody applications. Allegations of substance abuse by your ex can be tested with DNA hair testing samples that your lawyer can ask the Court to order, if dad is denying it. Of course, you will be subject to the same tests.

In an e-mail, he said the government "recognizes the right of parents to choose alternative forms of education for their children. However, our clear focus and our government's priority continues to be introducing measures that significantly improve the publicly funded system. The government remains committed to providing an excellent education system that is open to children throughout Ontario. We will continue to meet our constitutional obligations with respect to Roman Catholic schools."

Shimon Fogel

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his organization will continue to advocate for faith-based school funding.

"We're interested in provinces demonstrating equity in terms of funding and we do have this as one of the issues on our agenda," Fogel said, adding that "there could be any number of ways to approach it" in Ontario.

He said that although CIJA understands that the McGuinty government isn't willing to revisit the situation "there may be other formulae that can be used, or other considerations that would allow for… the same kind of [funding considerations], but not in direct allocations to Jewish schools."

CIJA intends to approach the Ontario government to discuss the issue this year as part of its "responsibility to our community," Fogel said.

Abbas wants Fatah to re-evaluate pact with Hamas

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement said on Sunday it would have to re-evaluate its reconciliation pact with the Islamist Hamas group after the rejection of a Fatah visit to the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip last week.

In a statement, Fatah's Central Committee said Hamas' behaviour showed it was not interested in the implementation of the reconciliation agreement signed in Cairo last year, which included the formation of a unity government and the holding of a parliamentary election on May 4.

Tension between the two Palestinian factions contrasts with the positive atmosphere stressed by both sides in December, when Abbas and Hamas chief Khaled Meshal met in Cairo and agreed on steps to end hostility.

Fatah said three of its senior officials were stopped by Hamas security officers at the entrance to the Israeli-blockaded territory on Jan. 6 and were forced to turn back.

The action by Hamas officers was "inadequate and humiliating," Fatah said in a statement. Hamas in turn accused Fatah of reneging on the Egyptian-brokered deal to end four years of bitter rivalry that has split the Palestinian national movement.

It said Abbas was putting peace talks with Israel, taking place in Jordan, ahead of Palestinian unity. Negotiators are searching for a way to revive direct negotiations, which have been suspended for more than a year.

"If Fatah has made a decision to backtrack from reconciliation in favour of returning to negotiation with the Zionist enemy, they should bear full responsibility for the consequences of such a decision before the Palestinian people, and the Egyptian mediator," Hamas said in a statement.

While Fatah recognizes Israel and is ready to negotiate a peace deal, Hamas refuses to do so. That has drawn a warning from the Jewish state that any pact between the Palestinian groups would scupper peace efforts.

Hamas forces seized control of Gaza in 2007 after a brief civil war that killed hundreds of Gazans, many of them from the two factions. Political divisions between them have weakened Palestinian aspirations to create an independent state.

The Hamas interior ministry denied it had made a decision to ban visits by Fatah officials and accused Abbas' movement of "exaggerating what happened" as a pretext for getting out of its reconciliation commitments. It noted that senior Fatah official Nabil Shaath had been in Gaza for several days without facing restrictions.

It also accused one of Abbas' envoys, Sakher Bseisso, of "cursing God" when asked by a Hamas officer to wait until he contacted his commanders.

Hamas said Bseisso would have to face a judge on the blasphemy charge if he visited Gaza in future.

We must respond to Iran's racist rhetoric

Shlomo Avineri
Ha'aretz Daily Newpaper Ltd.

In the public discourse about how to deal with the Iranian challenge, a distinction must be made between the nuclear issue and the racist rhetoric of the president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who denies the Holocaust and calls for the destruction of Israel.

The response to the nuclear issue is not simple, but it is at the centre of the international agenda and seems to have picked up momentum recently. The same cannot be said of the second issue, where both the international community and the Jewish public have failed to provide a suitable response. As was to be expected, there have been condemnations from heads of state and other leaders, but that is it.

Comment

Let us assume for a moment that the head of a European country were to say that the Holocaust did not take place and the State of Israel must be destroyed. There is no doubt that the European Union's reaction would be to recall ambassadors, if not to break off diplomatic relations or declare that leader persona non grata in EU member states. As a result of less severe statements by right-wing politician Joerg Haider, Austria was almost banished from the EU. And the president of Belarus, Alexander Lukashenko – who is not a danger to anyone except the citizens of his country – has been forbidden to enter any EU countries.

Sanctions of this kind were not imposed on Ahmadinejad, and this constitutes a severe political and moral failure, especially on the part of Europe, which in recent years has taken significant steps to include remembrance of the Holocaust in textbooks and in the collective memory.

The way the nuclear arming of Iran is treated is one thing, but in Ahmadinejad's racist, anti-Israel statements, we are talking about a basic issue where Europe can exert the so-called soft power of which it is so proud. It is not too late. There is no reason why the EU should not declare Ahmadinejad persona non grata in its region. While the Iranian president is not keen to take a trip around the continent, denouncing him as someone who is not wanted there would send an important message to the Iranian people. Sanctions must be imposed only on the Iranian president and not on the state. It is intolerable that such a step has not yet been taken.

There is also a Jewish failure in this matter. In the years when the Soviet Union prohibited the emigration of its Jews, the members of that community succeeded in making the lives of Soviet representatives miserable throughout the world. Through demonstrations outside Soviet embassies, embarrassing questions about freedom of emigration at all news conferences of Soviet leaders in the West, and in dozens of other ways, they turned the Jewish question into a burden on the shoulders of Soviet regime. The wide media coverage of these demonstrations helped the effort.

Israeli students reach youth worldwide with new media

Viva Sarah Press
Israel Bureau

Journalism – so surveys and polls warn – is a profession in danger of disappearing. Just don't tell that to the students enrolled at the Asper Institute for New Media Diplomacy at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) in Herzliya.

With the most journalists per capita in the world based in Israel, the apocalyptic forecast seems to be having the opposite effect here. New media organizations in Israel – especially digital versions – continuously pop up.

NoCamels (http://nocamels.com/) and IDC Asper Web Radio (http://1062fm.co.il/) are two of the latest media ventures to enter the scrum.

They are operated by students and staff from the IDC.

"Students are given tools and guidance from individuals at the top of their field, and their learning curve starts by immediately applying what they learn in the real world," said Michal Divon, director of public relations at NoCamels.

Anouk Lorie, director of the Asper Institute for New Media Diplomacy and editor-in-chief of NoCamels, said the IDC's products are as good, if not better, than professional journalism ventures.

Michal Divon, public relations director of the news website NoCamels, and Anouk Lorie, director of the Asper Institute for New Media Diplomacy

"I think our stories are at the same level, or even higher, than any other publication out there," Lorie said. "I do want us to be seen as a completely professional publication."

Both the recently launched Hebrew-language IDC Asper Web Radio and the one-year-old English-language NoCamels are based at the Asper Institute on the IDC campus. They are non-profit organizations.

"The radio operates with the mission of reaching students, soldiers and youth, connect with them and motivate them to caring, involvement, active participation in the community and responsibility for the environment," the IDC Asper Web Radio website states.

NoCamels is a digital Israeli news website that reports on innovations, health advances, environment and culture. It was launched in 2010 and already reports 30,000 hits a month on its website and some 9,500 fans on its Facebook pages.

Both these projects are exactly what the Asper Foundation of Canada had hoped for in June 2007 when the institute was inaugurated. At the time, Prof. Uriel Reichman, president of IDC Herzliya, said: "The Asper family's resolve to ensure that Israel's true voice is heard around the world is remarkable and is very much in sync with the goals of the IDC."

NoCamels is a mix of print articles and videos. It has a fresh and young design. And while there are tens of other English-language publications – amateur and professional – Lorie said NoCamels sees ISRAEL21c.org, an online news magazine focusing on 21st-century Israel, as its only competition.

"It is good for us to have some competition that does similar things. We thought the market is big enough to support at least two websites writing about innovations," said Lorie, who left a job at CNN in London, England, to make aliyah in September 2010. "I don't deplore that publications are writing about conflict in the Middle East, but I do find it unfortunate that not more is being written about incredible innovation we have here."

Just don't suggest that NoCamels is connected to the Israeli government.

"We're not doing propaganda for Israel," Lorie said firmly. "Any website that writes about Silicon Valley… are they propaganda for California? I think Israel really deserves to have a lot more coverage of its startups."

Divon, who is the daughter of a former Israeli ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, said, "NoCamels stands out from other Israeli media [because] we focus solely on non-political matters, yet maintain a 'news' standard, both in content and format.

"The niche-based structure we base our stories on has enabled us to cross all cultural divides. This is something we are able to see through our analytics."

Both Divon and Lorie say they were surprised to see who was reading NoCamels following its launch.

Statistics show that 75 per cent of the audience is international, primarily from the United States and Canada. On Facebook, one-third of the fans are Arab. The website attracts traffic from the United States and Canada, as well as Jordan, Turkey, Indonesia, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates.

As for the name of the site, NoCamels comes from the "cliché idea that people outside of Israel think of Israel as a desert with camels," Lorie said. "We're not against camels, but there's a lot more in Israel than desert and camels."

NoCamels and IDC radio are two of the many ventures of the Asper Institute for New Media Diplomacy. In fact, the cutting-edge projects at the institute, coupled with the school of communication's top-line professors and technology, recently enticed seven heads of journalism schools in Canada to visit the IDC to see whether joint study programs could be launched.

Olmert indicted

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert has been indicted on bribery charges in one of Israel's largest corruption scandals. The indictment filed Jan. 5 accuses Olmert of accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes during the construction of the Holyland apartment project in Jerusalem when he was mayor of Jerusalem and then later as Israel's trade minister. Seventeen others also were indicted in the case, including Olmert's former bureau chief Shula Zaken and Olmert's successor as Jerusalem mayor, Uri Lupolianski. Olmert is on trial currently in three other cases: for allegedly paying for family vacations by double billing Jewish organizations through the Rishon Tours travel agency; for allegedly accepting envelopes full of cash from American businessman Morris Talansky; and for allegedly granting personal favours to attorney Uri Messer when he served as trade minister in the Investment Center case. The ex-Israeli leader is charged with fraud, breach of trust, falsifying corporate records and tax evasion. He has pleaded not guilty on all the charges. Olmert is the first former Israeli prime minister to stand trial. He resigned as prime minister in September 2008 after police investigators recommended that he be indicted.

Nearly 700 rockets fell

Some 680 rockets, mortars and long-range missiles were fired at southern Israel in 2011, according to the Israeli military. On Jan. 5, the Israel Defence Forces released the figures compiled by the Home Front Command. Eighty long-range Grad missiles, which also have a more lethal payload, were fired at Israel in 2011 compared to two the previous year. Five rockets fell on or next to buildings. Nearly one-third of the rockets fell during 15 days. In addition to the siren early warning system, the Home Front Command is working to implement warning systems using mobile phones, the Internet and television, the IDF said.

U.S won't allow Iran to block Hormuz: Panetta

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Defence Secretary Leon Panetta said Sunday that the United States would act if Iran were to develop a nuclear weapon or close the Strait of Hormuz.

Panetta, speaking on the CBS TV show Face the Nation, said that if Iran started developing a weapon, the U.S. would act. "I think they need to know that – that if they take that step – that they're going to get stopped."

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Martin Dempsey, appearing with the defence secretary, said that he wanted the Iranians to believe that a U.S. military strike could wipe out their nuclear program.

"I absolutely want them to believe that's the case," he said.

Panetta did not rule out launching a pre-emptive strike.

"But the responsible thing to do right now is to keep putting diplomatic and economic pressure on them to force them to do the right thing," he said. "And to make sure that they do not make the decision to proceed with the development of a nuclear weapon."

Dempsey also said that Iran has the military power to block the Strait of Hormuz "for a period of time" if it decides to do so, but that the United States would take action to reopen the waterway. "We can defeat that," he said.

Panetta said closing the strait would draw a U.S. military response. "We made very clear that the United States will not tolerate the blocking of the Strait of Hormuz," he said. "That's another red line for us and... we will respond to them."

Leon Panetta

A number of experts say Iran is unlikely to close the strait, through which Gulf oil flows, because the action could hurt Iran as much as the West.

But an Iranian newspaper, the Khorasan daily, on Sunday quoted a senior commander of the powerful Revolutionary Guard force as saying Tehran's leadership has decided to order the closure of the strategic oil route if the country's petroleum exports are blocked.

Iranian politicians have issued similar threats in the past, but this is the strongest statement yet by a top commander in the security establishment.

In a talk at a Brookings Institution forum in December, Panetta said an attack on Iran's nuclear facilities would "at best" delay Iran's nuclear program by one or two years. Among the unintended consequences, he said, would be an increase in international support for Iran and the likelihood of Iranian retaliation against U.S. forces and bases in the Mideast.

Panetta also said Sunday that Iran is laying the groundwork for making nuclear weapons someday, but is not yet building a bomb.

As he has previously, Panetta cautioned against a unilateral strike by Israel against Iran's nuclear facilities, saying the action could trigger Iranian retaliation against U.S. forces in the region.

"We have common cause here" with Israel, he said. "And the better approach is for us to work together."

Panetta's remarks on Face the Nation, which was taped Friday and aired Sunday, reflect the long-held view of the Obama administration that Iran is not yet committed to building a nuclear arsenal, only to creating the industrial and scientific capacity to allow one if its leaders to decide to take that final step.

The comments suggest the White House's assessment of Iran's nuclear strategy has not changed in recent months, despite warnings from advocates of military action that time is running out to prevent Tehran from becoming a nuclear-armed state.

Iran says its nuclear program is only for energy and medical research, and refuses to halt uranium enrichment

Iran has opened two dozen of its facilities to international inspectors, but has refused in defiance of the UN Security Council to suspend its uranium enrichment.

In related news, Iran confirmed on Monday the start of uranium enrichment at its underground Fordow nuclear plant, Iran's Arabic language al Alam TV reported.

"All of Iran's nuclear activities, including enrichment of uranium in both Natanz and Fordow nuclear sites, are under supervision of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)," Iran's envoy to the agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, told al Alam.

An Iranian official who asked not to be identified told Reuters: "The enrichment in Fordow has started."

One must not remain silent

But Jewish communities have not reacted in a similar fashion to the denial of the Holocaust by Ahmadinejad or his threats to destroy Israel. There is no reason why demonstrations should not be held outside Iranian embassies anywhere in the world, why Iranian ambassadors should not be accompanied at every appearance or trip by demonstrators carrying placards reading: "Holocaust deniers out!"

One should not assume that Ahmadinejad will change his tune as a result, but media coverage of such demonstrations would cost Iran a heavy price in terms of its public image.

International Holocaust Day, as determined by the United Nations, will be marked on Jan. 27. It is still not too late from the EU's point of view: it can take the minimal symbolic step of declaring Ahmadinejad an outcast. It is still not too late from the point of view of the Jewish organizations, from the United States to Australia: they can organize protests in front of every Iranian embassy.

There are issues about which one must not remain silent, about which one must protest every day and every hour. One of those is the denial of the Holocaust by the leader of a country and his declared intention to destroy another country.

Israel, Canada get high ratings from OECD

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel and Canada got high marks in a report, the Better Life Initiative, recently released on the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development's (OECD) website.

"Israel performs favourably in several measures of well-being and ranks close to the average or higher in several topics in the Better Life Initiative," the OECD said in the document.

"Canada performs exceptionally well in measures of well-being, as shown by the fact that it ranks among the top countries in a large number of topics in the Better Life Index," the OECD stated.

The OECD index tracks well-being based on 11 "essential" parameters in the areas of material living conditions and quality of life. Among them are housing, health, income, jobs, community interaction, education, environment, governance and safety, as well as work-life balance and life satisfaction.

In its summary for Israel, the OECD, an organization of 34 of the world's most advanced industrial states, most of them democracies, reported that the average Israeli life span is 81.1 years, nearly two years above the OECD average. The life expectancy in Canada is 80.7 years.

In measuring income, the OECD found that Israelis' "average household net-adjusted disposable income is estimated at $19,456 a year (all figures US), lower than the OECD average of $22,284. Household wealth, the total value of a household's financial worth, was estimated at $62,684, much higher than the OECD average of $36,808. The Canadian figures were $27,015 in disposable income, but only $59,479 in average household wealth.

Looking at personal security, "the risks of people being physically assaulted or falling victim to other types of crime... in Israel, three per cent of people reported falling victim to assault over the previous 12 months, lower than the OECD average of four per cent."

In Canada, only one per cent of people reported falling victim to assault in a 12-month period.

The OECD found that Israelis live in more crowded conditions than the OECD average. "Overcrowded housing may have a negative impact on physical and mental health, relations with others and the development of children... In Israel, the average home contains 1.1 rooms per person, less than the OECD average of 1.6 rooms per person. In terms of basic facilities, an estimated 4.4 per cent of dwellings in Israel lack private access to indoor flushing toilets, more than the OECD average of 2.8 per cent of dwellings."

Though 81 per cent of Israelis aged 25 to 64 are high school graduates, their reading scores are not particularly high, the OECD reported.

Canadian homes, on average, contain 2.5 rooms per person while only .9 per cent lack private indoor flushing toilets.

On the jobs front, the index found that "in Israel, nearly 59 per cent of the working-age population aged 15 to 64 has a paid job. This figure is lower than the OECD employment average of 65 per cent." However, "the percentage of the labour force that has been unemployed for a year or longer is currently at 1.85 per cent, lower than the OECD average."

In Canada, "nearly 72 per cent of the working-age population aged 15 to 64 has a paid job... The percentage of the labour force that has been unemployed for a year or longer is currently at .97 per cent, lower than the OECD average."

Examining "work-life balance," the OECD rated Israel near the bottom when it took into consideration the employment rate of women with children, hours at work, and time devoted to personal care and leisure.

Israel scored five on the life-work index, placing it 31st among the 34 OECD members, ahead only of Mexico, Turkey and Japan. Canada was 14th with a score of 7.1.

Denmark received the highest score for life-work balance with a mark of 9.1.

The OECD reported that "in Israel, an estimated 55 per cent of mothers are employed after their children begin school: this figure is lower than the OECD average of 66 per cent and suggests that mothers encounter difficulties when balancing family and career."

The only countries where fewer mothers work are Greece (52 per cent), Chile (51 per cent), Italy (49 per cent) and Turkey (24 per cent).

In Canada, "71 per cent of mothers are employed after their children begin school," suggesting "mothers in Canada are able to successfully balance family and career."

The OECD noted that "a good work-family balance reduces parental stress, and thus benefits both parent-child and parent-parent relationships," the OECD stated.

Finding a good work-life balance is also a critical issue for child well-being, as children with two working parents are three times less likely to grow up in poverty than children with just one, the OECD found.

The OECD reports that the average person works 1,739 hours a year and devotes nearly 64 per cent of the day, or 15 hours, to personal care (eating, sleeping, etc.) and leisure (socializing with friends and family, hobbies, games, using the computer, watching television, etc.). Israelis devoted 15.15 hours a day to personal care and leisure, close to the OECD average.

Nearly 23 per cent of Israelis work more than 50 hours a week, the OECD found. Only Mexicans and Turks work more, and in the Netherlands just 0.62 per cent of people work more than 50 hours a week

Productivity in Israel is not particularly high. In recent years, the productivity of the G7 nations has been about 30 per cent higher than in Israel, according to OECD statistics.

Outdoor air pollution is relatively high in Israel. The level of "atmospheric PM10" – tiny air pollutant particles small enough to be inhaled and damage the deepest part of the lung – is 28 micrograms per cubic metre in Israel, higher than levels found in most OECD countries, the organization writes.

"Having a good education is an important requisite to finding a job," the OECD writes. In Israel, 81 per cent of adults aged 25 to 64 graduated high school, higher than the OECD average of 73 per cent. That doesn't necessarily mean they can read well, however. "As to the quality of its educational system, the average student scored 474 out of 600 in reading ability – lower than the OECD average," the report says.

In Canada, 87 per cent of adults aged 25 to 64 have earned the equivalent of a high-school diploma.

The OECD also found that "Canada is a top-performing country in reading literacy, with the average student scoring 524 out of 600. This score is higher than the OECD average of 493, making Canada the third-strongest OECD country in reading skills. Additionally, students performed well in mathematics and science, with more than 11 per cent reaching the two highest levels of proficiency."

Israel performed well in other areas. The OECD found there is a real sense of community in the country: 93 per cent say they know someone they feel they could rely on during a time of need. That figure is close to the OECD average of 91 per cent.

And what may be the most important of the factors considered, 72 per cent of Israelis said they were satisfied with their life, above the OECD average of 59 per cent. Seventy-eight per cent of Canadians were satisfied with their lives.

The Jew who invented the Volkswagen

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

In 2003, in an assembly plant in Mexico, the last classic Volkswagen Beetle rolled off the production line. It was the last in a long line of more than 21 million that had been built.

The history of the Volkswagen is fairly well-known, or so I thought. The car, designed by Ferdinand Porsche, under the careful guidance of Hitler, is one of the few successful remnants of the Nazi regime – along with the Autobahn, built especially for people to drive the Volkswagen, "the People's Car."

And then along comes this book, The Extraordinary Life of Josef Ganz (RVP Publishers) in which author Paul Schilperoord says that in fact the popular car was the product of the imagination of Ganz, a renegade Jewish engineer from Frankfurt.

Ganz sketched his first car as a young engineering student. He believed cars could be made lighter and safer, and from the beginning proposed that a "Volkswagen" could be sold at a price that ordinary people could afford.

At the time, in the 20s, only very rich people drove cars. At best, people drove around in incredibly unsafe motorcycles.

As a penniless student, however, he found it was impossible to build his dream car. So instead he turned to journalism, becoming the editor-in-chief of Motor-Kritik, where for five years he attacked the stagnant German car industry for designing cars that were far too expensive, ungainly, heavy, unsafe and outdated.

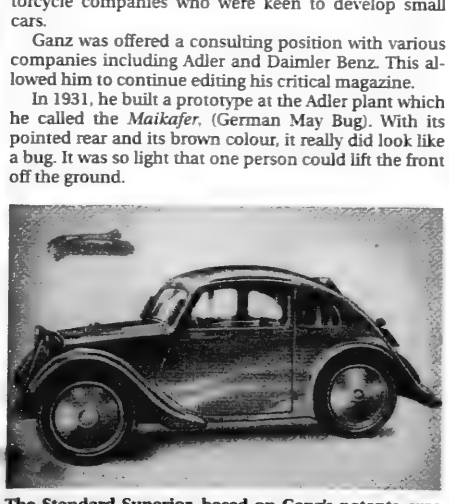
Ganz was rewarded for his efforts with a growing pool of readers, although he also gained criticism from the established industry who would have liked to put him out of business. In 1929, the RDA, the German auto industry, blacklisted his magazine.

The established manufacturers were not too keen to develop his ideas. They had designed and built cars according to their familiar methods for years. Who was this new upstart, a magazine editor, telling them how to do things?

But undaunted, Ganz continued to send his ideas for a small, affordable car with independent suspension, swing axles, backbone chassis and a rear-mounted engine, to various manufacturers, particularly to the motorcycle companies who were keen to develop small cars.

Ganz was offered a consulting position with various companies including Adler and Daimler Benz. This allowed him to continue editing his critical magazine.

In 1931, he built a prototype at the Adler plant which he called the Maikafer, (German May Bug). With its pointed rear and its brown colour, it really did look like a bug. It was so light that one person could lift the front off the ground.



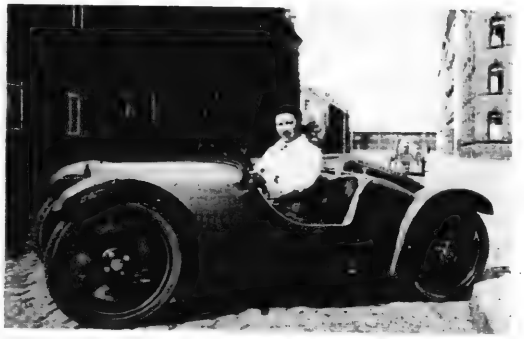
The Standard Superior, based on Ganz's patents, was featured in a 1936 cigarette- card series.

Other companies started to show interest but as the Depression ravaged the German economy, the time was not right for full production of a Volkswagen.

It was around this time that Ganz started to have falling-outs with other engineers. One of them was his former co-editor at Motor-Kritik, Paul Ehrhardt, a man with Nazi ties, who would later become his mortal enemy.

An issue of the Nazi magazine Die Nationale Front published a rather defamatory article in which Ganz was maligned as a "Jewish engineer" and his magazine described as "poisonous excrescence." Ganz believed that Ehrhardt was behind this article.

Although the May Bug never came to fruition, in 1932 another company, Standard, agreed to develop a car built to Ganz's patents. The end product was named the Standard Superior. It had a front end that looked remarkably like the later VW Bug.



Josef Ganz in the early prototype he called the May Bug.

The car would officially be launched the next year at an exhibition in Berlin in February 1933.

By this time, Hitler had just been appointed chancellor and Ganz was thrilled by Hitler's speech at the exhibition in which he underlined the great importance of an affordable car for all. Hitler was impressed with the Standard Superior and started to sketch his own designs, which borrowed much from Ganz's plans, including the price of under 1,000 Reichsmarks.

Things started to go downhill rapidly for Ganz. He became the prime target of his former colleague Ehrhardt, who was now working with the SD, the state secret police. Ehrhardt – who some linked to the 1933 burning of the Reichstag – was trying to portray the activities of Ganz as a Jewish conspiracy against the Reich. Ehrhardt, an opportunist, stood to benefit if Ganz disappeared, since he could then lay claim to Ganz's Volskwagen design for another company, Tatra, which he was associated with.

Within six months, Ganz had been dismissed as technical consultant to BMW and Daimler-Benz and lost his job at Motor-Kritik. After several arrests and patent battles, Ganz grew weary and left Germany. He spent the war years in Switzerland. Stripped off his German citizenship, he could no longer lay claim to his patents.

Hitler, meanwhile, appointed Porsche to head the consortium to develop the Volkswagen, the name now patented by the RDA.

After the war, Ganz left for Australia where his health declined rapidly and he died in 1967. After reading a book about the history of the Volkswagen, in which he was not mentioned, Ganz tried to tell the world how Hitler had stolen his plans to an Australian magazine. "The Volkswagen today principally is little different to the one I proposed in 1928. They haven't even changed the name."

The Volkswagen, meanwhile, took off. By 1955, the millionth bug had already been produced – but few remembered Ganz's involvement in it. The Nazis had done a good job of wiping Ganz's name from the history books of the Volkswagen.

The Extraordinary Life of Josef Ganz does get bogged down in technical specs and patent disputes, the reader comes away knowing far more about independent suspensions and swing axles than he probably cares to know. But Ganz's story is an interesting one for sure, one that deserves to be told.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Filmmaker hones his skills with TIFF

Laura Fixman
Special to The CJN

Isaac Cravit has had a short film in the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) for each of the last three years.

The 28-year-old filmmaker is currently working on another one for the festival.

Cravit said that for him the best part of living in the city is the presence of the film festival and that the palpable energy of the festival has made being part of it an amazing experience.

In 2009, the festival screened his eight-minute film Homeland Security, about a border guard who thinks his wife is cheating on him. It was a learning experience, Cravit said, adding that he probably didn't know how to use his time at the festival wisely that first year.

"I know what to do there now and how I should manage my time. I see as many movies as I can and try to make contacts because that's how movies get made."

Cravit, who graduated from Concordia University in 2006, made his first movie at the end of high school. He always knew that filmmaking was something he wanted to do.

"Anyone who's known me would know that this is what I want to do, and it's very rare that people get to do what they want," he said. "I can't remember a time when I didn't want to be a filmmaker."

The shorts Cravit made for TIFF had only two-day shooting schedules, but he said his 2011 contribution, Good Boy, which runs six minutes, took about 1,000 hours to complete. He added that every hour of work he does makes him a better filmmaker.

"I'm better at reacting now, and this is a largely reactionary job," he said. "The more experience you have, the more comfortable you are with reacting, and you can only plan and prepare for so much."

In Good Boy, he worked with a dog and a baby, and he joked that there was no way he could control a dog or a baby, so he could only see how they would react to each other.

Cravit plans to start shooting his next film this April, a short about kids in the 18th century who come across an injured animal and the implications that will have for their community. He also plans to shoot a feature film this summer.

"My ultimate goal is to be able to make a living at making films or TV," Cravit said. "Most people don't make a living at this and do it in addition to their full-time jobs."

He said that one of the difficult aspects of being a filmmaker is the necessity of applying for public funding, which he often waits for months to receive. He has received funding from Bell Media's Bravo!Fact (Foundation to Assist Canadian Talent).

Cravit's friends and family remain supportive as he gets his career off the ground. "I think there's an idea of how close Jewish families traditionally are, and my family is that close," he said. "They're my biggest support and they've always encouraged me."

Local writer sells thriller screenplay to Hollywood

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Shane Weisfeld doesn't give up. After writing scripts for 14 years, the Thornhill, Ont., native has finally sold his first feature-length screenplay.

The 37-year-old says he faced "so much rejection along the way," but is now thrilled that his crime thriller The Freezer is in pre-production.

It wasn't until 2010 that "things actually started happening" for Weisfeld and his writing partner, Tom Doganoglu. "We signed with a literary manager in L.A., and almost one year to the day The Freezer went into the marketplace, we made the deal for it to be produced."

Weisfeld says the producers plan to start shooting the film this winter in Puerto Rico. "Now that we've made our first deal, this is the true beginning of my career. We've been able to break through the Hollywood system."

The Freezer is about "an innocent man thrown into a walk-in freezer where he will freeze to death if he doesn't come up with the $3 million a criminal organization is convinced he stole from them," Weisfeld says.

"However, it's a layered story because as it progresses, you're not sure if this man is innocent or not, and why he's really in that freezer. There's also several characters throughout the story – it's not just him stuck in a freezer trying to get out… there's twists and turns."

He says the idea for the script came after he and Doganoglu spent years writing scripts individually and then realized they should try collaborating. "We put our heads together, knowing we wanted to write a contained thriller, and preferably a one-location contained thriller that had never been done before."

They each wrote scenes in person, over the phone and through e-mail. "I would write one scene, he would write the next, and this went on and on until we had a finished script. This is how we've continued to write," Weisfeld says.

Their manager in Los Angeles, Mike Kuciak, passed on the script to producers and executives, and Weisfeld and Doganoglu were in luck. "It just so happens that Hollywood is always thirsty for contained thrillers, partly because they're economical to shoot and many actors are looking for these types of roles where the entire story is focused on them, sometimes in one location only, like The Freezer."

Kuciak helped in communicating with a producer who wanted to make a deal. "We had been speaking with the production company for a while, and just this past November they were ready to go into pre-production," Weisfeld says. "They're based on the Paramount

Rejection made writer determined

Pictures lot, but it's being independently financed, which is cool because we'll get sole writing credit and any changes to the script come from us."

Weisfeld says he began writing short scripts in his first year of film school. In 1997, he wrote his first feature-length screenplay and has continued ever since. "I've been a writer my entire life, and the business and creative process of film is something I've been interested in for many years."

He says merging the two passions is how he got into screenwriting. "I knew in my last year of high school I wanted to be in the film industry in an above-the-line [creative] capacity, and going to film school with a concentration in screenwriting cemented my career goal in that field. I've written in different genres, but mostly thrillers. I love all kinds of thrillers – psychological, action, crime, heist, you name it."

Weisfeld has also written a hip-hop comedy, which is loosely based on some of his experiences. "It's something Drake is perfect for, because the main character is actually a black Jewish rapper. I also wrote a prison drama, which I placed second with in a major national screenwriting competition, and that has stood out in my mind over the years."

While he faced "the big, concrete, barbed-wired wall of rejection" many times, Weisfeld says the criticism hasn't negatively affected him. "Because of that I'm still standing and can school some young cats about persistence and perseverance. Sure, many times, it got me down and frustrated, but never to the point where I felt like quitting or questioned my ability."

Weisfeld says the rejection has made him "even more hungry and determined" to succeed. "There's absolutely nothing else I want to do for a living. Nothing will make me more happy, fulfilled and accomplished than carving out a career in screenwriting. It's not just something I want – it's something I need to do, and not as a hobby. It has to be a career. I won't expect anything less."

With The Freezer, Weisfeld says he and his writing partner "are on the brink of breaking in. I'm very modest and humble, though. We all have different views of the definition of success. I guess once the film is actually shooting, that's when it might hit me that I've achieved some success."

JEWISH WORLD MOURNS LOSS OF SINGERS ADRIENNE COOPER AND YAFFI YARKONI

Adrienne Cooper, the performer and teacher of Yiddish vocal music who mesmerized audiences from Carnegie Hall to the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, Moscow to Jerusalem, died of cancer in New York on Dec. 25 at the age of 65.

Cooper was instrumental in the revival of klezmer and Yiddish music and was "a pioneer in the effort to keep the embers of that language smouldering for newer generations," the New York Times wrote in an obituary.

She sang and recorded works with many bands and performers, including Alicia Svigals, the Klezmatics, the Toronto-based Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Toronto-based pianist Marilyn Lerner, who was her partner. She had many other Toronto connections and performed here numerous times.

She was a founder of the annual Yiddish-oriented KlezKamp in the Catskills, a programmer for the New York-based Workmen's Circle, and former associate director of the famed YIVO Institute of Yiddish Culture.

Cooper "was widely recognized as one of the world's leading vocalists of Yiddish song," the Workmen's Circle commented in a written statement. "Adrienne attracted followers from around the globe with her renditions of both classical and cutting-edge compositions. With each performance she furthered the audience's appreciation of her treasured Jewish cultural heritage."

Among her numerous awards, Cooper was the recipient of Klez Canada's Lifetime Achievement Award in Yiddish Arts and Culture.

For details about the passing of Israeli singer Yaffi Karkoni, please see the last item in this column.

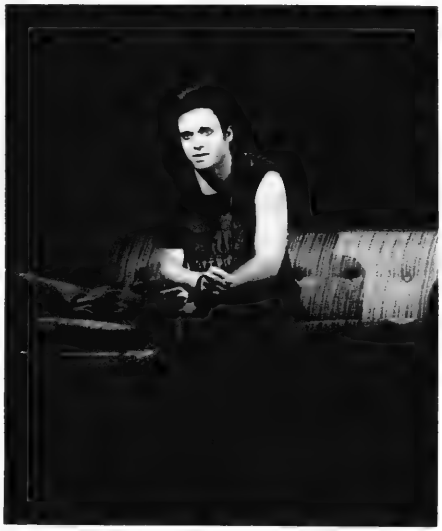
Passages: Israeli singer Yaffa Yarkoni, who entertained Israeli troops for decades, and late in life, was critical of the military for mistreating Palestinians, died on Jan. 1 at the age of 86.

A recipient of the Israel Prize, Yarkoni recorded hundreds of songs during her long career and was regarded as Israel's "war singer." In a statement of condolence to the singer's family, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that her songs "were the sound track of Israel from its pre-state days through the establishment of the state until our time."

Yarkoni once modestly remarked that she was fooling the entire world because "after all, I have no voice." But as lyricist Avi Koren, who was her friend for 45 years, told the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz last week: "She may not have had a voice, but she was the voice of the country. My mother listened to Yaffa Yarkoni, my grandson listens to Yaffa Yarkoni, and she accompanied us, the members of my generation, all our lives."



CANADIAN IDIOT: Toronto actor Jake Epstein plays Will in the musical American Idiot based on the Grammy Award-winning album by Green Day. Direct from Broadway, the musical features the hit songs Boulevard of Broken Dreams, 21 Guns, Wake Me Up When September Ends, Holiday and the title track. It follows the story of three friends forced to choose between their dreams and the safety of suburbia in a post 9/11 world. It continues running at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until Jan. 15. www.dancaptickets.com. [Doug Hamilton photo]

Stars of David shine in multicultural hockey tournament

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Israeli Stars of David celebrate their tournament victory in traditional style.

Is it too early to start talking about a dynasty? With three championships in four years, aren't they beginning to resemble the Oilers?

Somebody break up the Israeli Stars of David – they're too good!

OK, time to take a breath and climb back down to earth. The Stars of David are champions again, back-to-back winners of the premier division in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championship, a tournament that brings together hockey-loving players from the Toronto area.

This is becoming a tournament the Davids dominate, going undefeated in consecutive years and proving just how out of date that old joke is about the wafer-thin book of Jewish sports heroes. When it comes to hockey in Canada, Jewish guys can play. They've proved it time and again and their head coach, manager and overall hockey maven, Alex Voihanski, believes they would have won it in 2009 as well if not for a raft of injuries that left them with only 10 skaters.

This past holiday season, the Stars of David were a perfect 7-0 in round-robin and playoff competition – despite another raft of injuries. They defeated the Irish Shamrocks 3-2 in the final in what was a rematch of last year's championship game.

It was satisfying beating the Shamrocks, who tend to play a chippy brand of hockey, but who have failed to intimidate the Davids the past two championships. The Stars outshot the Shamrocks by a two-to-one margin, but the Shamrocks' goalie, who played in the American Hockey League and for the St. Louis Blues for a couple of games, "was fantastic," Voihanski said.

Voihanski, who runs JCC Chai Sports and is general manager of hockey operations for International Scouting Services, was certainly being diplomatic. The Stars of David have been pushed in recent tournaments, but they have yet to lose a game in two years.

There are a number of reasons for that, he explained: "We have very good players. There is an enormous amount of Jewish talent. There are so many quality Jewish hockey players."

This year's squad showcased a handful of them. Noah Schwartz, for one, plays for the London Nationals in the Greater Ontario Junior Hockey League, where he's team leader in scoring. One game into the tournament, he was called up by the OHL London Knights, where he registered one assist and was plus one in three games.

Stacey Britstone, a veteran of the OHL Plymouth Whalers and Oshawa Generals, who captained last year's gold-medal team, was expected to fill the same role this year. Unfortunately, he broke his leg the day before the tournament began and couldn't play. "He's a former MVP, captain and a guy who does everything we ask," Voihanski said.

Aaron Stein, perhaps the top defenceman on the team, broke his foot blocking a shot and was unavailable in the last two playoff games. Jesse Schwartz was called to play by his prep school after the round robin and also didn't skate in the playoffs. A third Schwartz brother, Brad, rounded out the family contingent, but they were matched by the three Weinberg brothers, Jordan, Adam and Bryan. All three play or have played in junior and college hockey. Bryan plays for York University and "arguably was the best player in the tournament," Voihanski said.

Another brother act featured Jason and Mike Pain. Jason played for a variety of minor pro teams. Mike played for the OHL's Saginaw Spirit and, more recently, York University. He led the Davids in scoring with two goals and six assists.

Then there was Daniel Leavens, a right-winger who scored four goals and two assists. Leavens plays for Newmarket Hurricanes in the Ontario Junior A Hockey League, was a member of Canada East in the World Junior A Challenge and is likely to earn a scholarship to an NCAA school, Voihanski said.

Other notables on the team included Alon Eizenman, who has played professional hockey in France as well as for the Israeli national team; Ran Oz, a 230-pound defenceman who also suited up for Israel and who made sure no one intimidated the Stars, and Sergei Frankel, yet another Israeli national veteran.

The team was backstopped by Kevin Kliman, who played for Brown University in the NCAA and Sal Cutillo, who was named tournament MVP.

Adam Weinberg, who played in his fifth tournament for the Stars, said the team has always featured "a good mix of players." This year they iced two scoring lines and had a smallish defence that was good at moving the puck. The team also had a blend of youth and veterans.

"We're always the best team with our speed. Nobody can keep up with our speed," Weinberg said.

The team played seven games in four days, Voihanski said, so "you try to roll three lines and keep your guys as fresh as possible.

"The key to our game is our cycling." A lot of the other teams don't want to play behind their own net. They get tired chasing the Stars, and when they do get the puck, they're so exhausted they can't do much with it, he said.

There are equally talented teams in the tournament, Voihanski said, but they don't come together as well as the Stars of David. The team, he continued, mirrors the larger Jewish community in being cohesive and tight knit. "The commitment is pretty good. I think that's what puts us over the top," he said.

Magen Davids spray-painted on Gatineau mosque

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), B'nai Brith Canada, Muslim groups, political leaders and others have condemned the Jan. 5 vandalism of a Gatineau mosque that included Stars of David spray-painted on the front doors.

"We unequivocally condemn all acts of vandalism against any place of worship," CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said in a statement issued the same day.

This kind of graffiti hurts everyone, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant said. "This incident doesn't just hurt the 4,000 Muslims living in the Gatineau area, but all Canadians.

"The use of the Star of David in connection with messages of hate only adds to the harmful nature of the recent incident."

Gatineau police were treating the attack as a hate crime.

According to news reports, last week's incident was the fourth in six months and the second last week at the Outaouais Islamic Centre. Police believe the attack was perpetrated by a lone man in his 20s who was caught on camera scrawling anti-Arab slurs on the centre's front doors, on the building's side and on two other entrances.

On Jan. 2, the windows of cars parked in front of the same centre were smashed.

Others condemning last week's attack included Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney. Harper called it "heinous."

It was also reported on Jan. 9 that another Gatineau mosque – the Mosque of Aylmer – was sent anti-Muslim slurs in the form of e-mail messages it received last week.

Artist inspired by her travels around the globe

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Some people take days, weeks or months to paint a picture. Jessica Gorlicky can do it in minutes.

The self-described abstract and figurative artist recently finished a 77-day run with the Cirque du Soleil's Totem show, where she put on a "live painting" performance each night in a VIP tent before the main show began.

"People were amazed. They were blown away," Gorlicky said in an interview. "They'd never seen the technology I was using, which was the LightBoard, and they couldn't believe how fast I painted."

She had 45 minutes to turn a blank four- by five-foot backlit canvas into a work of art, in front of an audience ranging from 30 to 300 people.

At the end of the evening, she would erase the bright, swirling colours to prepare for the next show's performance.

Gorlicky's Paint My Candy exhibit in October was one of her "greatest achievements."

Gorlicky, 31 and now a full-time artist, began painting regularly as a teenager living in Thornhill, Ont.

"It was my escape," she said. "All of my test papers had doodles everywhere – scribbles, faces and abstract things just floating around. And I would always be just playing with colour and paints."

When she was 18, she took a summer-long renaissance art history course in Italy, where she developed her skill painting landscapes.

After she got back, she began to paint faces, especially of women, which have become the subjects of many of her current works.

"I'm a woman. I have two sisters, and I have beautiful friends," she said, adding that she loves lighting and makeup. "All these things tie into why I love painting a woman's face."

Many of her paintings are brightly coloured, with lots of pinks, purples and oranges, and the occasional heart or butterfly on the canvas.

She spent years travelling the globe, an experience that she said gave her the inspiration for her many paintings.

"I can look at pictures and feel those experiences and remember brilliant moments," she said. "[You] take what you'd like from that moment and jump right into painting and creating."

She said she has sold about 2,000 paintings in her career so far. Many of these come from her live performances, which she puts on up to four times a week, while others are from commissions.

"I paint on my own a few times per week," she said, "and I'm not afraid to say that, because a painting doesn't always take me a week or two, or a month, or a year, like other artists."

Some weeks she doesn't paint at all, while other weeks end with many new works. She said she doesn't necessarily see her speed as a good or a bad thing, but working fast means she's very prolific.

She often produces paintings in groups with similar themes. She might sit in a circle surrounded by canvases that are all part of a group, and then take turns working on different pieces as each one dries.

She said her work is often commissioned by clients who come to her with specific criteria. One client asked her to incorporate his five favourite album covers into one painting.

Others specify the colours, subjects, and any other aspect of the painting they'd like to see in the finished product. She said she works to make sure their ideas are doable, but still meets their expectations.

"I don't think I've ever turned down a commission at this point, even a 20-foot wall of Batman and other superheroes," she said, explaining that this was an unusual request, but she has done it. "Generally it's my style that they want."

It's a challenge to create what someone else wants, she said. "You have to feel the energy and really listen to what the person wants."

In October, Gorlicky held her most successful exhibit to date, called Paint My Candy. It showcased 24 works of art plus another 25 on display for sale to an audience of more than 1,000 people.

She calls this show one of her greatest achievements as an artist.

Another career highlight was the eight-minute live painting performances she did before the Olympic torch came through Canadian towns leading up to the 2010 Olympic games in Vancouver.

In addition to expressing herself with paint, Gorlicky has learned to speak four languages – English, Italian, Spanish and French – and is currently learning Russian.

"I like to see how people express themselves in different languages," she said, explaining that she always recommends language learning, especially to young people.

"Language, to me, represents different colours and thoughts and emotions," she said, "so I think the emotional aspect I get from that – I put it into my work."

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

For example, she said some of her Indian clients paint their homes with reds and golds, and find cultural meanings in these colours.

Her own Jewish culture is an important part of who she is, she said, and five years ago, she travelled through eastern Europe visiting places her grandparents journeyed through during and after the Holocaust.

Starting in Romania, she followed her grandparents' trail as they were captured and brought to various concentration camps before finally being taken to Auschwitz. They were freed in 1945 and continued their journey through Europe trying to find a new home.

Despite this sad bit of history leading to a sad travel experience, she calls herself a happy artist, with most of her work conveying an upbeat, excited atmosphere.

And apart from her work exemplifying her love of the human body and colour, she said her work is about doing what you love and expressing it in every way.

"[Painting] is what comes naturally to me," she said, "and I'm trying to explore that with every fibre of my being all the time."

To visit Gorlicky's studio to see her work, e-mail jessica@jessgo.com, or call 416-451-0788.

'I love you, Mommy

"You've just missed a call," Meir says.

"Who was it?" I ask apathetically.

"It's a woman. She lives far away."

I see Meir's in the mood for quizzes. "I need more clues," I say.

"She says she loves you, she gave you birth."

"I'm gonna need some more clues."

Meir hands me the phone. "Go on, call her."

I frown. "But I don't like my mother. She's never been good to me. Because of her, I need to be loved by every Tom, Dick and Harry."

Meir pushes the phone closer to me. "Everyone loves you – Harry, too. Now call her."

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Me: Hi mother, heard you called. What do you wanna know?

Mother: Who is this?

Me: Your only child. How many drinks have you had?

Mother: Just one – after another. I'm joking. Can't a mother call her daughter without any hidden reasons?

Me: Of course. But that's not the case here. What do you want?

Mother: Hold on, I need to try and pull the knife out of my heart.

Me: As usual, ever so dramatic.

Mother: Good, now the knife has company.

Me (after Meir looks at me sternly): So, uh, how are you?

Mother: I feel lousy, lonely, isolated and miserable. After all, it's not every day a mother has the privilege of being abandoned by her only child.

Me: Mother, you couldn't remember my name when we lived in the same country, not to mention in the same house.

Mother: Hang on, I need to take my pills. For the heart, you know.

Me: Oh, lord. Do you wanna talk to the kids?

Mother: What kids?

Me: My kids, your grandchildren!

Mother: I'll pass, children are so boring. What's new with you, have you found a job yet?

Me: No. You're more than welcome to send me some money, by the way.

Mother: Money can't buy happiness, you know.

Me: No, but it can buy many other beautiful things.

Mother: Sorry, I don't do sympathy. Besides, you never want to talk to me.

Me: Well, enjoy it while it lasts… Many people would trade places with you.

Mother: Ha-ha. You must think I'm a selfish woman who just needs to be the centre of the universe.

Me: Are you expecting an argument? You never listen to anyone. No one else matters, or even exists. I don't want any contact with you anymore!

Mother: Am I crazy, or are you breaking up with me?

Me: They're not unrelated…

Mother: Please, don't hold back. So, I'll call next Friday. Same hour?

Me: As usual.

Mother: Love you, darling.

Me: I love you, Mommy.

To the memory of my beloved mother, Shoshana, who suddenly and unexpectedly died three weeks ago.

YUMMY SWEET POTATO SKINS

2 lg sweet potatoes	2 oz. light cream cheese
1 1/2 tbls. butter	1 c chickpeas
1 shallot, minced	1/4 c shredded mozzarella cheese
1 bag fresh baby spinach	salt and pepper to taste
1/4 c light sour cream

Bake sweet potatoes at 350° 45-60 min, or until fork tender. Cut in half, set aside and cool 5-10 min. Saute shallots in butter over medium heat until translucent. Add spinach, heat 2-3 min. until spinach has cooked down. Set aside. Scrape sweet potato pulp out of peel, leaving a thin layer inside the peel. Mash sweet potato with cream cheese and sour cream. Stir in chickpeas, spinach, and salt and pepper.
Coat scooped out skins with drizzle of oil, bake 5 min. for crispier outside. Remove from oven; fill each skin with sweet potato mixture; top with shredded mozzarella cheese. Bake again 10-15 min. or until cheese is melted and filling is heated through.

Thank you Richman's Bakery, Negev

When I was a kid, I didn't realize that everything started at some point, that all things, sentient or otherwise, were created. I didn't know that one day someone, somewhere, established Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. I figured it was all just there, and I simply happened to pass it by, as thousands had before me.

I thought the same thing about Richman's Bakery and the Negev Book and Gift Store, both on Bathurst Street. When I was little, I just figured that those honourable establishments had always stood there, at their crossroads. I thought that chocolate éclairs had sat next to their sister, the air-kichlach, in those cases at Richman's forever and that Hebrew DVDs were simply the younger brothers of eight-track Yiddish tapes, all of which could be purchased at Negev year-round, always.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Then I learned there was indeed a time when a local Jew figured it was a decent time to launch a bakery at York Downs Drive and another Jew decided the Toronto Jewish community needed a solid Judaica store selling sfarim and books. I realized that there was a time before Richman's Bakery and Negev Book and Gift Store.

Years later, though, I've learned, with great sadness, that community icons do disappear, that they can run out of wheat and can lose their market for havdalah candles. I know now that landmarks have their day and will be replaced.

Nothing stays the same except memories, and even they crumble and change over time.

I would like to thank Richman's Bakery and all of its owners for years of happiness and dancing paletes. Four generations of my family loved your rolls, pastries and cakes for all occasions. One of my finest memories while at Ner Yisrael Yeshiva was Thursday nights after hockey, when we would drive to Richman's and buy freshly made boston cream pies. In those days, given the chance, I could eat the whole cake by myself, with pleasure.

And I remember so well Mrs. Greenwald, Chavchi's mother, pointing to the freshest rum ball, coaxing me into purchasing it along with the tastiest-smelling cinnamon buns in the entire town. Richman's Bakery was a Toronto Jewish community emblem.

On behalf of the Jewish community, I would like to offer my appreciation to all the owners of Negev, for the annual Jewish calendar, mezuzot, books, tfillin, sfarim, wooden and plastic dreidels and the Forward newspaper. And I watch my father in my daydream as he fingers through a brand-new Chumash, standing, leaning as he perused the new edition in the way only a bibliophile would know how. Negev was integral to our landscape. Negev was central to our community.

While the backdrop of our community will be lonely without you. Your signs, windows, and nutritional and educational hospitality will forever be in our hearts. I realize now, more so than ever, that when I used to come from Kitchener, Ont., and drive onto Bathurst Street, Richman's was always there, without fail, and Negev stood long and welcoming, without disappointment.

But today, instead, I thank Lailah and Jonah for some fine desserts and the Kaplan brothers for some good stuff to read and for religious garments to wrap ourselves in.

Like the bakery and bookstores of old, you will always be part of our community narrative, archives and joyful memories. A dozen bagels, please, and a velvet tallit bag to go. Yasher koach.

Peace talks resume in Jordan

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian envoys met for the third time in Amman overnight Sunday since Jordan began mediating a series of direct Mideast peace talks earlier this month.

The sides agreed to meet again on Jan. 25, the official Palestinian Wafa news agency reported.

Jan. 26 is the date set for the Palestinians to decide if they wish to stop or continue the talks.

The Palestinian side was persuaded to enter into the Jordanian-led talks despite the absence of an Israeli settlement freeze, until then a Palestinian precondition for direct negotiations with the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"It is up to Israel to decide if negotiations will happen or not. It's very easy. They just have to fulfil their international obligations... including a full settlement freeze. The ball is on their side, not ours," Xavier Abu Eid, a senior adviser to chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, told the dpa news agency Sunday.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas told senior members of his Fatah party that "if we agree on a common ground, then we go to negotiations, but if the ground is not there, then what are we supposed to negotiate about? So far, there is no agreement on the ground."

Abbas' spokesperson Nabil Abu Rudeineh was quoted in the semi-official daily al-Ayyam as saying that "Jan. 26 remains a crossroad. We either make progress in these exploratory meetings or we will be forced to take decisions."

Israel disputes that deadline. It says the timeline for the two parties to submit proposals on borders and security set in September by the quartet of Middle East peace mediators – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations – actually began with the start of the Amman talks on Jan. 3.

Meanwhile, the U.S. State Department has urged both parties not to get fixated on dates.

Same-Sex First

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg synagogue is about to become the first Conservative shul in Canada to host a same-sex wedding ceremony. On Jan. 21, Shaarey Zedek Synagogue will see the "renewal" of marriage vows between two men wedded in a civil service in Vancouver in 2004, the Winnipeg Jewish Post and News reported. Canada legalized same-sex marriage in 2005. The service will be under a chupah and conducted by Rabbi Larry Pinsker. It's the culmination of a three-year process of welcoming gays and lesbians into the congregation. The first stage was to allow same-sex couples to buy joint burial plots in 2009. The second was to welcome them as members. While the Conservative movement's committee on Jewish law and standards, in December 2006, approved extending blessings to same-sex unions in commitment ceremonies, same-sex couples in the congregation weren't satisfied with that. They wanted their unions to be sanctified. "The Shaarey Zedek has been talking the talk," one of the men, Arthur Blankstein, 67, told the newspaper. "Now it is time for the congregation to walk the walk."

TA 'Best Gay City'

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv was named best gay city for 2011 in a poll sponsored by American Airlines and Gaycities.com. The city was chosen best city of 2011 in the Best of Gay Cities 2011 poll. Tel Aviv received 43 per cent of the votes, followed by New York with 14 per cent and Toronto with nine per cent. The award shows that "Tel Aviv-Jaffa is a city that respects all people and allows everyone to live according to his/her own principles," Mayor Ron Huldai said. "Ours is a city in which everyone can be proud of who they are." More than 5,000 gay tourists visited Tel Aviv in June for its annual pride parade.

More Than 1,000 Attend Cemetery Vigil

VICTORIA — More than 1,000 people held a vigil in Victoria a week after vandals desecrated headstones in a Jewish cemetery in the British Columbia capital.

Rabbi Harry Brechner

"All of us coming out here and standing together tells us that we will not be silent in the face of hate crime," Rabbi Harry Brechner told the Jan. 8 gathering, which included local city councillors and other officials as well as Jews and non-Jews.

Five graves in Victoria's historic Emanu-El Jewish Cemetery were vandalized Dec. 31 with swastikas and other hateful language, leaving the small Jewish community shaken.

Police are treating the graffiti as a hate crime and are urging residents to come forward with information.

Rabbi Brechner told vigil participants several stories about Holocaust survivors buried in the cemetery.

"The idea of putting hate symbols near their graves is despicable and my hope was that that person can come forward, but you know what? All of us came forward," Rabbi Brechner said, according to the Victoria Times-Colonist. "This, all of us, this is hope."

Pastor Explains

CLEVELAND — Comments by the Rev. Keith Hudson, father of pop star Katy Perry, in a sermon at an Ohio church were taken out of context, the church's pastor said. Rev. Paul Endrei of the Church on the Rise in Westlake said Rev. Hudson's remarks were meant to be complimentary, but "went too far." On Jan. 5, Rev. Hudson told churchgoers, "You know how to make the Jew jealous? Have some money, honey. You go to L.A., and they own all the Rolex and diamond places. Walk down a part of L.A. where we live and it is so rich it smells. You ever smell rich? They are all Jews, hallelujah. Amen." Rev. Endrei said Rev. Hudson was praying that business owners be as blessed as the Jews, to the extent it would make Jews jealous. Rev. Endrei also said his church is pro-Jewish and that he recently led a church mission of 42 people to Israel.

10-year-old battles rare cancer

Fundraiser planned for January 28

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A young boy's battle against a rare cancer has spurred fundraising and awareness campaigns and brought members of Toronto's Jewish community together for a good cause.

On Jan. 28, in honour of 10-year-old Jake Wagman, hundreds of friends, family, well-wishers and Grateful Dead fans will gather at Lee's Palace in downtown Toronto for some live music and to raise money for Ewing's sarcoma research.

Marni Brooks, Jake's mother, explained that her son was diagnosed with Ewing's – a cancerous bone tumour that usually affects children during puberty when bones are growing rapidly – less than a year ago.

"My husband and I were out of town in April 2011, and my mother-in-law was watching the kids and she took them to a movie," Brooks recalled.

"Jake told her he was seeing double during the movie."

When his vision problem didn't correct itself, Jake was taken to see his doctor, who then advised that he go to the Hospital for Sick Children.

Brooks said that not only is the cancer itself unusual, but her son developed a tumour in an uncommon location, in his skull. It took about two weeks more to discover that the source of the tumour was Ewing's.

Brooks said her 15-year-old niece was inspired by her cousin's ordeal and enlisted the help of two of her friends to create a website in Jake's honour called Jake's Collection.

To date, Jake's Collection has raised more than $12,000 for Ewing's cancer research, and despite the fact that Jake completed his required 14 rounds of chemotherapy and 33 radiation treatments, the fundraising will continue.

Wishful thinking in the land of the pyramids

Many journalists are assessing the results of the Egyptian elections, which saw Islamists winning about two-thirds of the parliamentary seats, and are predicting that pragmatism and moderation will trump religious ideology.

In the Jan. 8 New York Times, Thomas Friedman admitted that it would be "recklessly naive" to ignore the Islamists' illiberal, theocratic leanings. Nonetheless, he said, it would be wrong to assume that Islamists "will not be impacted, or moderated, by the responsibilities of power, by the contending new power centres [in Egypt] and by the priority of the public for jobs and clean government, [as this] is to miss the dynamism of Egyptian politics today."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Yet having argued that since analysts don't know how this will turn out and therefore should just "shut up and take notes," Friedman then ignored his own advice by strongly implying that pragmatism underscores basic Egyptian values.

Visiting a female-only voting centre in a very poor Cairo neighbourhood, he related that most of the niqab-clad women there, some illiterate, told him that they voted for the Brotherhood and Salafists, but "almost none said they had voted that way for religious reasons." Instead, they voted for Islamists in the hopes of getting good, clean government. He noted that the liberal parties had not campaigned in their area, with the implication that had they done so, these women might have voted for them instead.

What Friedman – whose accompanying translator was a 22-year-old, educated, "secular" male who had protested in Tahrir Square – failed to see is that the desire for order and services is not incompatible with strict religious observance. In fact, survey results show Egyptians to be among the most religiously conservative in the Islamic world. Moreover, it shows that like many western, secular journalists, Friedman arguably cannot just "take notes" uninfluenced by what he might prefer to believe about Egypt's move toward democracy. What, for instance, might he have heard had his translator been a veiled, religious female?

Writing at the same time but expressing a more skeptical point of view was Robert Fulford. In "The Muslim Brotherhood's big moment" (National Post, Nov. 7), Fulford argued against what he called "a dangerous epidemic of wishful thinking," which includes the Obama administration's recent decision to reverse longstanding American anti-Islamist policy by reaching out to the Muslim Brotherhood.

"Washington apparently accepts, for the moment, the Brotherhood's claim that it wants an Egyptian government that will respect religious freedoms, free markets and international commitments, including Egypt's treaty with Israel," Fulford wrote.

"Will they change their extremist ways as they achieve some power? That would mean turning against all the fierce preachers and propagandists who spread the Islamist ideology over eight decades. It could happen, but not likely," Fulford cautioned.

Last month, Fulford decried the lack of media attention to the critical subject of the economic malaise – "the stunted economic development" as he called it – that has long bedeviled the Arab world. How, he asked, with the expectations for freedom and democracy unleashed through the Arab Spring, will emerging governments "improve the material lives of the people" through jobs, housing, and affordable food?

The evidence indicates that the situation Fulford describes is getting worse, not better.

In the Jerusalem Report magazine (Jan. 16), Bruce Maddy-Weitzmann of Tel Aviv University's Dayan Center provided details on just how grim the Egyptian situation is:

- Foreign currency reserves continue to drop by $ 2 billion a month;
- Inflation, already at about nine per cent, could rise further if the Egyptian pound is devalued;
- Food prices have shot up sharply;
- Revenue from tourism, a crucial sector of the economy, has dropped by 33 per cent, and
- The economy in 2012 is expected to grow by only half of the six per cent needed for stable job creation.

In this desperate economic climate, and with Islamists on the rise, the prospect of unfulfilled hopes and renewed strife remains a looming, if not imminent, threat.

CIJA debate tackles online hate

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

A controversial section of the Canadian Human Rights Act that covers hate speech on the Internet was up for debate at a town hall in Toronto last week, with a human rights lawyer arguing for its retention and a civil libertarian calling for its repeal.

The Jan. 10 debate on Section 13 of the act, held at the University of Toronto's George Ignatieff Theatre, was intended to be the first in a series of similar events on issues of the day to be organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

Section 13 outlaws hate speech spread via the Internet or by phone. Complaints about hate speech that fall under this category can be brought to the Canadian Human Rights Commission and may end up before the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal.

Constitutional scholar Richard Moon recommended the repeal of Section 13 in 2008, and there's currently a private member's bill in Parliament calling for its repeal that's expected to come to a vote in the spring.

Supporters of Section 13 see it as an effective tool in fighting hate speech, but those who seek its repeal consider it a limit on free speech and an unnecessary addition to the law, given the provisions against advocating genocide and the public incitement of hatred that are already a part of the Criminal Code.

Arguing for its retention at the CIJA event was human rights lawyer Richard Warman, who has been a successful complainant in 15 Internet hate cases since 2001, when Section 13 was amended to clearly include online messages.

Arguing for the section's repeal was Nathalie Des Rosiers, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and a former president of the Law Commission of Canada.

Well-known criminal lawyer Edward Prutschi moderated the debate.

"The Internet is not the Wild West in Canada,'" said Warman, adding that people can and should be held accountable for hateful material they post online.

He argued that "it is the hate propaganda that leads to the acting," so fighting hate speech online is part of fighting it off line as well.

Warman also argued that for the Criminal Code to be an effective tool in combating hate speech on its own, significant additional resources are needed. Largely because those resources aren't in place and because there is "an institutional reluctance to lay these kinds of charges," he said, Section 13 is both necessary and effective.

In contrast, Des Rosiers argued that pursuing hate speech through Section 13 is a misallocation of resources and can chill free speech.

"There will never be enough resources to go after everything that is discriminatory," she said. "Going after acts may be a better investment."

She added that although controlling speech was not the intention of the section, it seems to have had that effect. "It is dangerous in any society to leave the government with the task of deciding which points of view can be expressed and in which way," she said.

This year, mom is living at a Chartwell retirement residence and they are both sleeping better.

More than ever, we're balancing a variety of responsibilities including caring for our aging parents. When we can't be there or distance separates us, we may begin worrying that they are not eating well enough, taking their medication regularly or remembering to lock the door while alone.

Chartwell retirement residences provide the safety and security your parent needs with the services and activities they want. At the same time, you'll know that help is available 24 hours a day. If the time has come to start considering the options best suited to your situation, we can help.

Toronto physicians visit Israeli hospital

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A group of physicians from Mount Sinai Hospital travelled to Eilat in the fall to partner with physicans at Yoseftal Medical Center.

Founded in 1968, Yoseftal is the southernmost hospital in Israel, and the only hospital covering the southern Negev desert. With 80 beds, it is Israel's smallest general hospital.

The purpose of the trip was to build a relationship between the two hospitals and to share what they have in common, said Maureen Shandling, neurologist and vice-president of medical affairs. She has been to Israel several times, but this was her first visit to the Eilat hospital.

"[Yoseftal] is small, but it provides an amazing breadth of care to a diverse population who speak many different languages.

"It is interesting to see their challenges. They deal with terror victims, accidents, births – whatever needs to be done. They provide the best quality care in a small space with less infrastructure than we have at Mount Sinai."

She said that plans are to continue Mount Sinai's relationship with the hospital, have physicians come to Toronto for additional training and have Mount Sinai residents work at Yoseftal.

"We were so warmly welcomed, and that warmth is reflected in the UJA partnership."

Maureen Shandling

Mount Sinai staff on the trip included Shandling; Tom Stewart, chief clinical officer and chief of medicine; Matt Sermer, head of obstetric medicine and medical director of the Frances Bloomberg Centre for Women's and Infants' Health; David Blackstein, head of orthopedics and medical director of the Centre for Musculoskeletal Disease; Eric Goldszmidt, deputy anesthesiologist-in-chief; and Sev Perlman, emergency staff physician and director of the post-baccalaureate research education program.

The trip was supported through the D.H. Gales Family Foundation, and is part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Eilat-Eilot Partnership.

'Response to bad speech is stronger speech'

Des Rosiers suggested that a better way to fight hate speech is with condemnation. "The response to bad speech is stronger speech, better speech and more speech, not less," she said.

During a question-and-answer session, the Jewish Defence League's national director, Meir Weinstein, challenged Warman about a section on Warman's website regarding a short film called Fitna, which Warman describes as "a 16-minute long video by Dutch far-right, xenophobic politician Geert Wilders that seeks to demonize the Muslim community using classic hate propaganda techniques."

Weinstein also took issue with a link to another website that, among other topics, includes strongly anti-Israel views, including a reference to "Israeli apartheid."

Warman stood by his assessment of Fitna as being criminal hate propaganda against Muslims, adding that he fights hate speech directed at any community.

He also noted that his site states that he doesn't necessarily endorse the viewpoints presented on linked websites, and that he personally finds the claim that Israel is an apartheid state to be "bogus."

CIJA chair, David Koschitzky, told The CJN that CIJA will be launching a web seminar series in February about controversial issues related to Judaism and Israel. The first topic in the series, titled Unity not Uniformity, will deal with religious pluralism and the role of women in Israel.

"Our feeling is that to be as inclusive as possible, we have to educate people as to how many different points of view there are," Koschitzky said. "In spite of these diverse opinions, we are unified."

Siddur from 1471 reveals gender flexibility

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A 15th-century siddur offers an alternative to a traditional prayer for Jewish women, indicating that attempts to introduce egalitarianism in Judaism can be traced back many centuries, the Jewish Theological Seminary said earlier this month.

While observant Jewish men traditionally recite a morning blessing to thank God for "not creating me a woman," the common counterpart for women is a prayer blessing God "for creating me as you wished."

Instead, the 1471 siddur, part of the library collection at JTS, the flagship institution of the Conservative movement, has a morning blessing that says, "Blessed are you, Lord our God, Master of the Universe, for you made me a woman and not a man."

> JTS publicized the siddur in the wake of recent incidents in Israel involving haredi men who objected to what they called immodest behaviour by women and girls in public places

The siddur was written by the scribe Rabbi Abraham Ben Mordechai Farissol, a French-born Italian rabbi, scholar, cantor and physician who lived from 1451 to 1525. JTS publicized the siddur in the wake of recent incidents in Israel involving haredi men who objected to what they called immodest behaviour by women and girls in public places, such as refusing to sit at the back of a public bus frequented by haredim.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin – professor of humanities at York University and spiritual leader of Toronto's Partnership Minyan – told The CJN, "There certainly was a history of liturgical flexibility in Judaism in the past. It's a shame – I'm saying this as an Orthodox rabbi – it's a shame that so many people now define Orthodoxy in terms of no possibility of liturgical flexibility."

The likely historical explanation for decreased flexibility, he said, was a feeling that the Reform movement had gone too far in liturgical innovation.

Rabbi Lockshin added that Rabbi Farissol was not seen as a "breakaway" rabbi.

Eric Lawee, professor of humanities at York University with an interest in medieval Jewish history, told The CJN in an e-mail that he would be cautious about imbuing Rabbi Farissol's variation with "all sorts of intentions that, absent some corroborating evidence, are hard to verify at this historical distance."

He added that the rabbi copied the text for a patron – a wealthy Jewish man who commissioned it as a gift for his wife – "so one wonders a bit whose views (or what liturgical traditions) this text reflects."

However, it serves as "a good reminder that in a manuscript age in general, both among Jews and gentiles, there was inevitably a much higher degree of fluidity in texts of all sorts." With the introduction of the printing press came "a certain rigidity," he noted.

He added as well that Rabbi Farissol was not a halachic decisor. "Since traditional Jews will see the fraught issue of liturgical change as primarily or not exclusively a halachic one, the fact that a figure with no reputation or legacy as a halachist made a change in a siddur that he copied carries no weight, especially if the change is not reflected elsewhere."

In a news release, JTS professor and librarian David Kraemer said the siddur showed "a tremendous amount of courage.

"Rabbi Farissol was a very well-known and appreciated rabbi, so one can assume that he wouldn't have agreed to make such a change if he didn't think it was appropriate."

Rabbi Julie Schonfeld, executive vice-president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, said in the release there is "no chance that this kind of siddur from 1471 could be compiled and used today in the religious atmosphere we are seeing in much of Israel."

She added that the siddur proves that "degrading attitudes toward women, which we are seeing in certain extreme religious communities in Israel today, are a modern distortion of Judaism… We can turn to Jewish history for examples of the flexibility of rabbis and scholars in striving to meet the religious needs of men and women."

Let the PA talk straight

For the first time in many months Israelis and Palestinians sat face to face across a table to discuss how to revive the rather stagnant peace process. The third of three planned meetings was held in Amman this past weekend. A fourth meeting will likely be held next week.

To be sure, it is a refreshing development that the two sides actually spoke to each other. But the refreshment may not be sufficiently reviving, as the parties cannot agree whether the Quartet (the European Union, the United Nations, the United States and Russia) deadline for resuming direct talks is Jan. 26, March 26, or even whether there is a deadline at all.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told U.S. President Barack Obama that his government will give the Palestinians a formal statement of its views on final borders in March. Netanyahu also told the president that he believes bona fide negotiations can be concluded within one year.

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, on the other hand, echoing Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' words, said direct talks between the two sides cannot proceed as long as Israel continues construction in the West Bank and does not recognize the pre-1967 Mideast war frontier as the baseline for the borders of a future Palestinian state.

The two Palestinian preconditions are as transparently pretextual as they are insurmountable. Abbas, Erekat and the entire Palestinian world know that Israel cannot and will not ever accept the preconditions. Setting aside the disingenuousness of the construction demand – raised for the first time as an echo of a regrettable statement by a newly elected Obama – Israel cannot agree in advance of negotiations to starting from the pre-June 1967 borders.

The reasons are many. But the most profound is that doing so means surrendering to the PA – before negotiations – all of the Jewish neighbourhoods of greater Jerusalem, including the Western Wall and the Jewish Quarter of the Old City.

How could Israel do that?

The question of Jerusalem lies at the heart of the Jewish return to history some 63 years ago. The division of Jerusalem was an artificial residue of the armistice in 1949 and the expulsion of the Jews from the Old City was an aberration of Jewish history. Jews had always lived in Jerusalem.

That is not to say that arrangements regarding Jerusalem and the Temple Mount cannot be made as a result of honest, sincere negotiations that take into account historical and present sensibilities of both peoples.

But to ask Israel to surrender – ahead of peace talks – what it retrieved and restored from wanton, derisive, contemptuous destruction, is absurd. To demand that it do so as a condition of even restarting peace talks is nothing more than a ruse on the rest of the world. The Palestinian leaders should talk straight.

The U.S. Justice Department asked a court in Washington, D.C., to sentence U.S. Navy analyst Jonathan Pollard to a "substantial period of incarceration" and a fine for spying for Israel. Pollard, then 32, was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty to espionage charges in a plea deal.

Obama and Israel (1)

Sheldon Kirshner had to be very selective to conclude that accusations of U.S. President Barack Obama not being pro-Israel are "unadulterated nonsense" ("Conservatives impugn Obama's pro-Israel record," Jan. 5). For example, Kirshner doesn't tell us that Obama has yet to visit Israel as president. He doesn't say that in his much-anticipated Cairo speech, Obama openly stated that Israel was created as a result of the Holocaust, completely ignoring thousands of years of Jewish history in the Holy Land.

Kirshner neglects to mention that Obama was the first U.S. president to insist that settlement construction must stop, a demand even the Palestinians had not yet made. On the question of settlement building, Kirshner disingenuously refers only to the West Bank and the Golan, ignoring the huge fuss the Obama administration makes every time further building is approved in Jewish neighbourhoods in Israel. Everyone knows these will remain in Israel under any peace plan, yet Secretary of State Hillary Clinton loses no opportunity to criticize Israel harshly and to claim they're the only impediments to peace. Arab intransigence, terrorism and incitement are completely ignored.

Then there's the pre-1967 lines, which Kirshner erroneously refers to as "borders." These are armistice lines where fighting stopped in 1948. Every peace plan has envisaged new borders to be mutually agreed upon by Israel and the Palestinians. Obama was the first president to state categorically that the pre-'67 lines are the starting point for any deal, which dramatically erodes Israel's negotiating power. As for Obama's strong pro-Israel stance in recent months, Kirshner fails to note that this came only after a Republican won a New York seat that had been safely Democrat.

In short, if Kirshner had included all the facts, his column would have ended very differently.

Sheldon Kirshner is way off base in his one-sided support for U.S. President Barack Obama ("Conservatives impugn Obama's pro-Israel record," Jan. 5). True, Obama never misses an opportunity to say he stands side by side with Israel, but his actions clearly show otherwise.

Let's just focus on two, of many, examples. First, Obama tied peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians to a freeze on building beyond the Green Line – something the Palestinians had never insisted on. Now it's become a Palestinian pre-condition to restarting talks. Second, Obama undermined Israel by saying the starting position should be the pre-1967 borders, with land swaps. Undeniably, the 1949 armistice lines are militarily indefensible, and a retreat to those "borders" will seriously jeopardize Israel's security. This, too, has become a Palestinian pre-condition.

Another four years of Obama in the White House would be nightmarish. I wish the Republicans success in the upcoming election.

Fourth Geneva Convention applies to West Bank

Yehudit Shier Weisberg's letter, "Says writer got the facts wrong" (Jan. 5), warrants a lengthy reply, but let me just respond to a couple of representative points. The argument that Gilo is to the south of Jerusalem and thus in some way not part of east Jerusalem is an almost laughable quibble. Most of the world defines east Jerusalem as that part of the city that existed outside the pre-1967 armistice line, and that is exactly where Gilo is located. More significantly, Weisberg states that the Fourth Geneva Convention does not apply to Judea and Samaria. It is true that Israel argues that the convention does not apply in the occupied territories. But the rest of the world sees it differently. Canada's foreign affairs department explicitly states, "Canada does not recognize permanent Israeli control over territories occupied in 1967 (the Golan Heights, the West Bank, east Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip). The Fourth Geneva Convention applies in the occupied territories and establishes Israel's obligations as an occupying power."

Seeking a level of comfort with fellow writers

Erika Dreifus
JewishIdeasDaily.com

Some days, I can't help thinking back 25 years to my high-school French course, which is where I first encountered the concept of the juste milieu – the happy medium – and the difficulty of achieving it. Why is the happy medium so elusive? Why do I more often feel caught betwixt and between or, even among my fellow Jewish-American writers, alone?

When I read something about the new generation of Jewish immigrant writers from the former Soviet Union, I become acutely conscious of my privileges as a native-born American. But when I read interviews with certain American-born Jewish writers my age, I am keenly aware of my closeness to the immigrant experience – to my maternal grandmother, who escaped east European persecution, and my paternal grandparents, who escaped Nazi Germany. I remember that I am merely a second-generation college graduate and that my parents would likely not have been able to attend college were it not for what was then a largely free public university system.

And when I hear other Jewish writers my age talk about how antisemitism is irrelevant to "our generation," I am astonished. When I moved from Brooklyn at the age of nine to a non-Jewish neighborhood in a New Jersey suburb, I discovered country clubs and social dancing lessons – and the fact that they excluded me as a Jew.

But these issues don't get to the heart of the patterns of politics and outlook that separate me most from my ostensible peers. That heart is Israel.

In a 2009 column in the Forward titled "How I'm Losing My Love for Israel," author Jay Michaelson reported, "It has become simply exhausting to maintain the ambivalence, the hugging and the wrestling, the endless fence sitting. My love of Israel has turned into a series of equivocations: 'I do not support the expansion of settlements, but the Palestinians bear primary responsibility for the collapse of the peace process in 1999.' 'The Israelis acted overzealously in Gaza, but they must be entitled to defend themselves against rocket attacks.'"

The "complexity and ambiguity," he summed up, "wear one out." Michaelson went on: "I admit that my exhaustion is exacerbated because, in my social circles, supporting Israel is like supporting segregation, apartheid or worse." But, he explained, "I don't think advocates of Israel understand exactly how bad the situation is on college campuses, in Europe and in liberal or leftist social-political circles."

I have more than a passing acquaintance with the contemporary writing scene that forms part of Michaelson's "liberal or leftist social-political circles," and he is right. The situation there is bad.

In defending Israel, you risk alienating friends, editors and critics. As open-minded as these "liberal or leftist" circles claim to be, they are as quick as their analogues at the other end of the spectrum to judge and scorn. There is no place for centrists. Like Jay Michaelson, I find it all exhausting.

But unlike Michaelson, when forced to choose sides, I choose Israel. Unfortunately, for me, choosing Israel often means the opposite of engaging. Because I cannot find a juste milieu, I bow out. I exit.

In 2006, I resigned from the National Book Critics Circle, whose leadership had made the organization's blog a mouthpiece for criticizing Israel, promoting works like Jimmy Carter's book on Palestine and the treatise by professors Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer on the "Israel lobby."

In 2009, I unsubscribed from a popular women's poetry listserv because it had become a reliable source of condemnation for the war in Gaza in the winter of 2008-2009.

In each case, I made my choice after speaking up – and becoming a target of abuse, online and off. Rarely, another writer defended me. Slightly more often, I received appreciative private e-mails.

It wasn't enough. It still isn't.

These days, my objections are even quieter – for example, "unfollowing" writers who devote their tweets and Facebook posts to applauding the various flotillas and condemning Israel for enforcing the Gaza blockade (which even the United Nations deems legal). Though not about to launch any boycott campaigns, I won't support anti-Israel writers by buying or promoting their books. Recently I declined to join the 2,000 writers, many of them Jewish, who signed an "Occupy Writers" manifesto supporting "the Occupy movement around the world." I cannot join a blanket endorsement of a movement that may well grow to include more episodes like "Occupy Boston occupies the Israeli Consulate" (you can find it on YouTube).

What troubles me most is that too many Jewish writers, particularly those with whom I am naturally linked by age and education, not only haven't objected to their friends' routine demonization of Israel – not only have they decided that if they must choose between Israel and their literary friends, Israel must go – but they go out of their way to broadcast their criticisms.

There was a time earlier this year when you could barely spend five minutes on Twitter or Facebook without encountering pieces like Allison Benedikt's "Life After Zionist Summer Camp" or Kiera Feldman's "The Romance of Birthright Israel." In the Jerusalem Post, McGill University Prof. Gil Troy described these essays as resembling 17th-century "captivity narratives": after being "force-fed diets of Zionist folk tunes" and dazzled by "hunkalicious Israeli soldiers," the writers "courageously flee their brainwashing into the welcoming bosom of the New York intelligentsia, rejecting Israel while embracing Palestinians, about whom they claim they never were taught."

But I'll bet a year's worth of book sales that most of my literary acquaintances haven't read Gil Troy. They consider the Jerusalem Post more "biased" than, say, The Nation (which published Feldman's article) or the New York Review of Books. To suggest that anything the Jerusalem Post or Commentary has to say may merit attention is tantamount to recommending Fox News over MSNBC. (On the other hand, it doesn't help when Commentary's chief literary blogger, a smart man, derides the Occupy Writers' petition as a "useful list of useful idiots.")

I know Israel isn't perfect. I will listen to criticisms arising from a sincere concern for Israel's health and security. I absorb critiques like Peter Beinart's "The Failure of the American Jewish Establishment," which raised a ruckus in the New York Review of Books. I pause whenever journalist Jeffrey Goldberg warns against misguided Israeli policy – I am convinced that he writes about Israel with all his heart, soul and might.

I wish I could do the same. I believe that with a little training and lot more study, I could do a better job of making a case for Israel, even gaining the ability to acknowledge its flaws publicly. My responses might not remain so visceral. I wouldn't have to resign, unsubscribe and "unfollow" so often.

Since I am too old to be of interest to most programs that provide Israel advocacy training, you can imagine my delight when I saw in my local Jewish newspaper that a version of Write On for Israel, a program that trains high-school students to become advocates for Israel through journalism, would be offered for those of us on the far side of college graduation – and my disappointment when I received a more recent e-mail notifying me that the program has been delayed at least a year.

But I'll keep looking. There has to be a place where I can be an American writer and a Zionist, a place between the diatribes on the National Book Critics Circle blog and the sometimes equally inflammatory responses from the other end of the spectrum. There has to be a juste milieu.

Reform Biennial was an eye-opener

I recently spent 10 days in North America and returned home after some remarkable experiences.

I'm president of the largest Reform synagogue in Jerusalem and was asked to join a contingent of Israel Movement of Progressive Judaism (IMPJ) professionals and lay-leaders to the Union of Reform Judaism (URJ) Biennial outside Washington D.C., in mid-December.

I decided to travel privately to Toronto en route to the conference, not having visited in more than a decade. Among olim, I'm considered pretty lucky. My parents and sister also live in Israel, and I feel no urgent need to make annual pilgrimages to the place where I grew up. But it really had been too long, and this was an opportunity to see friends and family.

Preparing for the trip, I put aside time to talk to people, especially older friends and family members. It was time well spent. I spent meaningful hours hearing stories I'd never heard from people dear to my heart, people who've gone through much in their lives.

It was also a chance to catch up. I was wonderfully taken care of, with delectable brunches, lunches and munchies. I was amazed at how I comfortable I felt again with persons I see too rarely.

Perhaps most memorably, I spent a magical evening with 15 primary school friends I grew up with. We shared memories and pictures of kids, realizing again how much the years together had shaped us and what a special bond they had created among us.

Flying from Toronto to Washington, I said to myself: "Dayenu." If the trip had ended there and then, it would have sufficed. I had seen almost nothing of Toronto, but I came away delightfully enriched.

Yair Lootsteen
in Jerusalem

The flight was an appropriate lead-in to the second chapter of the trip – completely different, yet also stirring.

Growing up in Toronto, my parents were members of a wonderful Conservative shul, Beth Tikvah Synagogue. I rarely visited Reform temples, except for friends' bar and bat mitzvahs, always feeling they were somewhat foreign, with not enough Yiddishkeit.

In Jerusalem, my own family couldn't find a synagogue that fit our needs. After trying different congregations, we joined Kehillat Kol HaNeshama, our spiritual home and centre of much that goes on in our lives.

My involvement at Kol HaNeshama led to the URJ Biennial invitation, and I was thrilled that I accepted the invitation. It was an eye-opener. Some 6,500 proud Reform Jews representing 900 American congregations with more than 1.5 million members gathered for five days of learning, worship, music, speakers, advocacy, networking and much more.

Most were Americans, but there were folks from other places, too, including a Canadian delegation and smaller ones from the United Kingdom, Germany, Poland, Russia, Ukraine and Israel. This biennial had the largest Israeli presence to date.

At plenary sessions, we heard wonderful keynote speakers, including U.S. President Barack Obama, who noted the URJ's importance to North America's Jewish milieu and how significant it (and particularly its Religious Action Committee) was in advancing civil rights in America during the last several decades.

Music could be heard almost round the clock, while smaller gatherings dealt with assorted issues concerning Reform Judaism: how congregations are dealing with the financial crisis, tikkun olam, Jewish education, youth empowerment, camps, the Internet and Israel-related matters, to name but a few.

The transition between outgoing URJ president Rabbi Eric Yoffie, and his successor, Rabbi Rick Jacobs, was central to the entire event. So were daily prayers. And twice – Friday evening and Shabbat morning – 5,000 people worshipped together, mostly in Hebrew. It was overwhelming, as was Rabbi Yoffie's inspiring farewell sermon describing the movement's achievements and its future challenges.

Concern and support for Israel and the IMPJ and its pluralistic agenda were abundant – more than I'd expected. Rabbi Jacobs invited a small group of Israeli delegates to hear our vision of the future relationship between the North American and Israeli Reform movements. Rabbi Richard Hirsch, the man most instrumental in forging the special relationship between Israel and the URJ, was honoured with a special award, and ARZA (the Association of Reform Zionists of America) staff and volunteers were highly visible championing the IMPJ. It was tremendous. I was proud to be part of it.

Arriving home, I understood how much I'd learned during this trip about the importance of my own Canadian roots and about the positive, albeit demanding, direction of American Reform Judaism.

The sky is not falling in Israel

Judging from media reports, Israel might appear to be in the midst of a radical and violent political and religious polarization. "Hilltop youth" from the settlements are seen allegedly burning mosques, as well as attacking "peace activists" and even IDF officers. Haredi men are shown assaulting secular women in segregated buses and even on sidewalks, and members of Israel's democratically elected Knesset are portrayed as waging war against the courts and civil society.

As in many press reports on Israel, the reality is often sensationalized and exaggerated out of all proportion, both for commercial reasons ("Jews are news") and as part of the campaign to portray the Jewish nation-state as doomed to failure.

In reality, Israeli society is far more unified than American society, with its all-out ideological warfare between conservatives and liberals. Unlike in the United States and many European societies, the conflicts and acts of violence from Beit Shemesh to Mea Shearim are confined to small fringes, and they reflect the ideological and power struggles between the different extremes.

In each case, the fringes on both sides benefit from the confrontation and manipulate the clashes in order to promote their visibility and power. The perpetrators of the attacks on women (and even schoolgirls) and of other forms of violence are known as the sikarikim – a small haredi fringe seeking to gain attention through extremism. At most, a few hundred individuals are involved. In contrast, the vast majority of this community, like other Israelis, is clearly repulsed by this violence, and many rabbis have denounced these actions.

But in parallel, Israel also has an intolerant ultra-secular fringe, waging ideological war against what they see as closed and antiquated versions of Judaism, and the haredi community's failure to carry its weight economically or in the army. In politics, as in physics, for every action by one extreme, there is an equal and opposite reaction. The attacks on the women and girls have provided the excuse for the anti-religious to spring into action. On both sides, supporters have been bombarded with warnings of dire threats to treasured values unless the faithful stand strong.

Violent incidents involving a small group of young extremists in the settlements, under the name of "tag michir" (price tag) follow a similar pattern. Fundamental questions related to the borders of Israel, the status of settlements beyond the pre-1967 "green line" and whether a lasting peace agreement with the Palestinians is possible remain wide open and intensely debated. Most of the settlement community is repelled by this crude violence, and the tag machir group represents the hard-core fringe. But they gain legitimacy by opposing groups from the other ideological extreme, such as Peace Now and Machsom Watch. Both sides use headlines and attention to promote their visibility and influence, and to attract funding.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

In contrast, the vast majority of Israelis are alienated by all of these groups, as reflected in voting behaviour and public opinion polls. The general public across the religious-secular and left-right spectrum rejects both the ideologies and the use of violence and intimidation. Israelis have grappled with a number of very complex dilemmas for decades, and most realize that radical "solutions" and miracle cures don't work.

But in both the Israeli and international media, each incident becomes a headline – a certain sign that Israel is cracking at the seams. Many reporters ignore or don't understand the unique complexity that Israelis face. These details fare poorly in the competition for news space. Other journalists have a pre-formed hostile attitude toward Israel, blowing any incidents out of proportion and giving all of the fringes far more credit than they deserve. This gives the extremists the attention and influence they crave.

Israel is a very complex country, with more than its share of rough edges and plenty of room for improvement. But the manipulated images of violence and extremism are far from the reality.

Blood libel tarnishes a small American town

"I'll tell you flat out," Gus said. "It's time you knew. This girl who disappeared, it's the Jews." His lips curled up as if the very word tasted bitter.

"The Jews?"

"They have strange customs for their holidays. Terrible customs. They use blood. Drink it and bake it in their special foods. Blood of a Christian child…"

This chilling exchange appears in Shirley Reva Vernick's The Blood Lie (Cinco Puntos Press), a young adult novel that deals with one of the oldest and most despicable antisemitic myths, the blood libel, a vile accusation that has demonized, marginalized and subjected Jews to violence.

Blood libel has reared its ugly head in Europe, particularly medieval Britain, czarist Russia and Nazi Germany.

But the United States?

On Sept. 22, 1928, two days before Yom Kippur, a rumour began floating around Massena, a town of 15,000 in upstate New York near the Canadian border with a Jewish population of about 150, that a four-year-old Christian girl, Barbara Griffiths, had been kidnapped and killed by Jews in a ritual murder.

The next day, a Jewish resident of Massena whose knowledge of Jewish customs and traditions was limited, was questioned by state police. He left them with the impression that there might be truth in the allegation that Jews engage in ritual murder. The police then called on the town's rabbi, and he indignantly told them they should be ashamed of themselves for asking such absurd questions.

Later that day, Barbara was found alive in the woods about a mile from her home. She told rescuers she had lost her way during a walk and had slept in the forest.

The New York Times, having picked up the story, turned it into a national event. The American Jewish Committee denounced the incident, prompting apologies from Massena's mayor and police.

"I couldn't believe what I heard when I first learned about the blood libel," said Vernick, 50, who was born and raised in Massena. "I was shocked that something like this had happened in America in the 20th century. It sounded like a page out of eastern Europe in the Middle Ages. I still wonder how anyone, even a bigot, could buy that canard."

Vernick, a professional writer who lives in western Massachusetts today, learned about the Massena blood libel while in college.

"During my sophomore year,

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

I came home for a fall break with an assignment for a sociology class. Students had to identify a local community conflict – past or present – and write a paper on it. I remember thinking, no controversies ever happened in my dinky little town of Massena. So I asked my dad, who grew up in Massena, if he had any ideas. That's when he told me, for the first time, about the blood libel, which happened when he was a high school senior.

"The minute he told me the story, I knew one day I'd write more than a term paper about it. This was a story that not only spoke to me, but grabbed me by the throat and screamed at me. I felt compelled to illuminate this episode in Jewish history, as well as to inspire readers to contemplate the consequences of, and possible responses to, intolerance."

To the best of her knowledge, the Massena blood libel was the first reported one in the western hemisphere, while The Blood Lie is the first novel of its kind to be published in the United States.

Massena is a few kilometres from the St. Lawrence River, which forms the international boundary between Canada and the United States. It is named in honour of Andre Massena, a French general who fought under Napoleon.

Shirley Reva Vernick

Originally, most of the people in the town were white Protestants, but eventually it was also populated by French-Canadian and Irish immigrants.

With the construction of an immense aluminum plant in the early 20th century, labourers from across Europe, mainly Roman Catholics and a handful of Jews, trickled into Massena. But according to Vernick, the first Jewish settlers, including her paternal grandfather, Samuel Levine, arrived in the late 1890s.

On the eve of World War I, Massena had enough Jewish men to form a minyan, though there was still no rabbi.

In 1919, the Jewish community bought a church, removed its spire and renamed the building Adath Israel. By then, the synagogue had hired Berel Brennglass – a Lithuanian Jew who had arrived in America in 1915 – as its rabbi, shochet and Hebrew teacher.

Massena, N.Y., in the 1920s

Levine was the proprietor of a clothing store, but Vernick's father, Abraham, was an anesthesiologist. Abraham's wife, Blanche, was a television producer in New York City, but after marrying Abraham, she became a high school English teacher in Massena.

Vernick's family was directly victimized by the blood libel. "A state trooper showed up at my father's house late the night of Griffith's disappearance and made my grandfather open his shop," she said. "The trooper searched the store to see if any Jews had stashed the little girl's corpse there."

Asked what effect the blood libel accusation had on the Jews of Massena, Vernick replied, "Short-range, it terrified Jews, who feared a pogrom. Jewish people were afraid to walk the streets or let their children walk to school. A boycott of Jewish businesses lasted for several weeks.

"Nothing ever appeared in the local newspaper, the Massena Observer, about the blood libel – no acknowledgement and certainly no apology – probably due to embarrassment on the part of the antisemites. Still, the Jewish community stayed put in Massena, continuing to serve as generous, hardworking citizens."

Since the blood-libel incident, Massena's population has shrunk to approximately 13,000 today. The town is still predominantly white, but the Jewish population has declined sharply, in common with other small towns in the United States.

Vernick has some fond memories of Massena and visits occasionally. "But as a child, I overheard a neighbour, an adult, saying, 'Hitler wasn't so bad.' That hit at my core. Also, other children told me that the Jews killed Christ."

Strolling in the downtown area one day, she saw swastika graffiti. Five years ago, the Jewish cemetery was vandalized, and two 15 year-old youths were charged.

The youngest of five children, Vernick, now the mother of two daughters, left Massena after graduating from high school to attend college and launch her writing career. "It wouldn't have been feasible or desirable to return to Massena after college because of the dearth of Jews, jobs and social-cultural activities."

Vernick's sister and her family, however, still live in Massena. Her parents are deceased.

She claims that Massena has yet to come to terms with the blood libel. "In the immediate aftermath, it was hushed up. But most people never found out about it. I hope The Blood Lie will help start a constructive conversation in town."

Hockey star describes recovery from substance abuse

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Theo Fleury began his destructive dance with alcohol and drugs at a fairly young age. He was in his mid-teens, away from home and playing hockey when a coach sexually molested him.

"That left me with pain, confusion, guilt and anger, and the only way I could cope with the abuse was drink, drugs and go to the dark side of life," he said.

It took him years to end his dependence on drugs – it prematurely ended a very successful NHL career in which he was an all-star and Stanley Cup winner.

Today, he is an inspirational speaker, addressing audiences with his cautionary tale of substance abuse. He delivered his message last week to an audience of more than 700 at Forest Hill Collegiate, in an event sponsored by JACS (Jewish Addiction Counseling Services) Toronto.

Today, kids are even younger – 12 and 13 – and hipper than he was when he was first enticed by drugs, Fleury told The CJN. They exchange information through social media and begin experimenting in late adolescence. As teenagers, they are often going through emotional turmoil and like him, turn to drugs as a crutch to help them get by. They can become hooked if they have an "addictive personality," having inherited a gene that makes them less able to rein in their impulses.

It's something parents have to be concerned about, as it is quite widespread, he said.

So what can parents do?

"It's all about keeping the lines of communication open, always having an open-door policy with your kids and allowing them to tell you what is going on in their lives," said Fleury, who won the Stanley Cup with the Calgary Flames in 1989.

Fleury, who told his story in the bestselling book Playing With Fire, advises parents to avoid being judgmental. "The presentation is very important," he said. "Don't yell and scream. They'll tune you out in five seconds. Get to his level, talk, and be calm.

"You want to deter kids from experimenting, but present it in a way that scares them a little bit. Tell them nothing good comes out of drinking too much alcohol, experimenting with drugs, staying out late or getting involved with the wrong peer group."

Fleury advises getting kids involved in other activities and to stay involved in their lives. It doesn't really matter what the activity is, just be there with them, he suggested.

Despite busy lives, parents have to organize their time "for each child and let them know they are the most important part of your life."

JACS assistant director, Mark Freedman, hopes Fleury's advice will strike a chord among some of the spectators who came to hear his "Don't Quit Before the Miracle" presentation.

"His career ended because of substance abuse problems and the behaviour that goes with it," Freedman said. "Shortly after he was let go by the New York Rangers, he sought recovery.

"He speaks candidly about substance abuse and the road to recovery."

In addition to the public address at Forest Hill Collegiate, Fleury spoke to high school students at Westmount Collegiate. It was part of JACS outreach program, in which JACS representatives visit more than 50 high schools every year to educate young people on substance abuse and addiction, Freedman said.

JACS is affiliated with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "It services the community in many different ways, in terms of helping individuals, families, couples deal with substance problems." JACS helps people with other forms of addiction, including gambling, he added.

From January to September 2011, "we reached more than 6,600 people in all JACS activities," up from 5,500 in the same period the year before, Freedman said.

"Often the common thread that brings people together is the position they find themselves in and the realization of what their families are going through – that it's not something they can fix themselves.

"They recognize they need support, and JACS offers confidentiality and anonymity. They can come to groups or for counselling and talk about what is going on in their lives.

"The Jewish community is no different than anyone else in terms of addiction and substance abuse. Removing the shame factor is a big thing. It's not something to be ashamed about, but that's how the healing can begin," he said.

Richard Lewis Takes to the UJA Stage on February 9th

Comic Legend Performs at Campaign 2012 Celebration

By Daniel Horowitz

Richard Lewis, the featured performer at United Jewish Appeal's upcoming Campaign 2012 closing celebration on February 9th, has accumulated an impressive array of well-deserved kudos for his unique, neurotic and hysterical comedy over the years.

Recognized by Comedy Central as one of the top 50 stand-up comedians of all time and included on GQ Magazine's list of the '20th Century's Most Influential Humorists', the 64-year-old Lewis shows absolutely no sign of slowing down.

And, while he admits that the accolades are "nice", Lewis, one of the stars of HBO's critically-acclaimed Curb Your Enthusiasm, is quick to credit those who came before him as being the true comedy greats.

"Those lists are totally subjective, as nice as some of them sound," says Lewis. "The ones that came first and broke ground usually are the greatest. There are many forms of comedy and it is hard to top Sid Caesar in sketch comedy and Carl Reiner and Mel Brooks for their sheer authenticity and laughs, and Shelley Berman and Nichols & May and the astounding Jonathan Winters, Phil Silvers and Jackie Gleason in sitcoms. And then, for me, Lenny Bruce and Richard Pryor set the bar for the type of stand-up I enjoy the most."

While Lewis has had a profound impact on comedy, he's also impacted our vernacular as well.

Yep. You read that correctly.

Lewis claims to be the originator of the phrase "The _____ from hell" as in "the date from hell" or "the roommate from hell". This theory is expounded upon in the Curb Your Enthusiasm episode "The Nanny from Hell". In fact, Lewis has petitioned the editors of Bartlett's to be given credit for the coinage, but the editors claim that the phrase was a common idiom prior to Lewis' use of it. However, the Yale Book of Quotations does attribute the phrase to Lewis, so we'll give him that one.

Born in 1947 in Brooklyn, New York, and raised in Englewood, New Jersey, Lewis graduated from Ohio State University in 1969 with a degree in marketing and communications. He wrote ad copy in New Jersey while also writing jokes for comedians.

Lewis is no stranger to Toronto, and, clearly he looks forward to his February visit. Asked what he remembers most from his previous visits to our fair city, Lewis replies, "the gigs and the love affairs. But now, I'm married, so just the gigs and seeing the beautiful city."

Being cast on Curb Your Enthusiasm just may have been preordained for Lewis - he first met Larry David, the show's creator and the man behind Seinfeld, when both were about 12 years old, around 1960.

"We had met at a sports camp in upstate New York," recalls Lewis. "We despised one another. I never saw him again until after a year of starting to make a name for myself in New York City nightclubs along with Jay Leno, Billy Crystal, Andy Kaufman, and others. He came on the scene and he was just spectacular. Plus, we became inseparable best friends. We wound up retracing our past and when we both realized we went to the same camp and were once arch rivals, we almost came to blows. Then we laughed at the amazing coincidence and the bond was set for life."

Richard Lewis

Lewis, a self-confessed political junkie who enjoys listening to jazz and classic rock when he's not on stage, has dealt with – and continues to deal with - his share of struggles. As a recovering alcoholic for almost 18 years, Lewis has a special place in his heart for the holiest of Jewish holidays.

"I've grown to really appreciate the importance – not only as a Jew – but as a person, for much of the significance of Yom Kippur for atonement and repentance," he says without a trace of humour. "One crucial part of recovery is taking responsibility for one's actions and on this holiest of days, that surely is part of it."

So, tell me Richard, which is your least favourite Jewish holiday?

"The ones which have the most food with sugar, as it triggers my addiction and has sent me screaming and running from people's homes many times."

So, rather than asking Richard Lewis to come to your home for, say, a Passover seder where sugar is all - too - present, it may be easier to join him on Thursday, February 9th, at Toronto's Events on the Park at 7:30 p.m. Join us as we honour our leadership, volunteers and donors, and celebrate the success of UJA Campaign 2012 while enjoying an evening of comedy.

Tickets are only $30 and can be purchased online at ujaevents.com/registration/lewis or by email at jgonik@ujafed.org or call 416.635.2883 EXT. 5229. Includes dessert reception, Kashruth observed (COR)

Turkey wants to restore good relations with Israel, consul general says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Turkey values its relationship with Israel and hopes that current mutual tensions can be resolved amicably, the Turkish consul general in Toronto declared last week.

"Turkey has the will to make peace with everyone," Ali Riza Guney said in an interview. "That is why our foreign minister has set the target of having 'zero problems with neighbours.' So why should Israel be different? We had good ties with [Israel] until the end of 2008."

Guney, who served in Turkey's consulate in Jerusalem from 2005 to 2009, added, "Turkey and Israel had strong, multidimensional and friendly relations which we valued."

The state and people-to-people ties cut across political, economic, military, scientific and cultural lines, he said.

In a reference to the influx of Sephardi Jews into the Ottoman Empire after the Spanish Inquisition, he noted, "The deeply rooted bonds between the Turkish and Jewish people date even further, five centuries before the Israeli state was established."

Turkey, the first Muslim state to recognize Israel, upgraded relations with Israel in a wide range of fields after the 1993 Oslo accords.

In 2000, Israel and Turkey signed a free trade agreement, and in 2005, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan visited Israel. Two years later, Israeli President Shimon Peres addressed Turkey's parliament. Turkey served as a mediator in Israel's four rounds of talks with Syria in 2008.

After Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in early 2009, Erdogan harshly criticized Israel.

Bilateral relations further deteriorated in May 2010 when Israeli naval commandos boarded the Mavi Marmara – a Turkish ship in an international flotilla trying to break Israel's siege of Gaza – and killed eight Turkish nationals and one ethnic Turkish American citizen.

Ali Riza Guney

Calling the raid an act of aggression, Turkey demanded an official apology, compensation and the lifting of Israel's naval blockade of Gaza, which has been ruled by Hamas since 2007.

In the aftermath of these events, Turkey recalled its ambassador in Tel Aviv, while Turkish and Israeli diplomats tried in vain to defuse the situation. According to Guney, agreements were reached, but Israel did not implement them.

Tension was already high before Israel's raid. In a diplomatic incident in Jerusalem in January 2010, Israel's deputy foreign minister publicly rebuked Turkey's ambassador to Israel, resulting in an Israeli apology to Turkey.

Last September, after the United Nations released a report saying that Israel's blockade of Gaza is justified but that Israel used "excessive" force aboard the Mavi Marmara, Turkey expelled Israel's envoy in Ankara.

Recalling Israel's raid on the Gaza-bound flotilla, Guney said, "This attack on civilians left an indelible mark in the hearts and minds of the Turkish people. The fact that the attack came from a friendly country increased the indignation further."

Asked why Turkey had not prevented the Mavi Marmara from leaving port, he said, "The Turkish government tried to dissuade the Turkish participants not to take part in the convoy, but it did not work."

Guney, who assumed his current position in Toronto last month after heading the Middle East department in the foreign ministry, said Turkey has proven its willingness to improve relations with Israel.

"We continued manifesting a constructive approach by holding talks with the Israeli authorities to overcome the problem and by demanding simply an apology and compensation," he said.

Israel apologized to Egypt last summer after accidentally killing five Egyptian troops following a terrorist attack in the Negev desert. "I think it is fair enough to expect from Israel the same maturity to be displayed for Turkey."

Guney, whose previous postings included Saudi Arabia and Germany, said Turkey attaches "great importance" to its relations with Israel. "Especially in the midst of historic events unfolding around us in the Middle East and North Africa, we need to be in tandem more than ever."

Noting that his nation has traditionally had an "unwavering and friendly" position on Israel, he said Turkey has never questioned Israel's right to exist and lent Israel legitimacy by being the first Muslim state to recognize it. "I sincerely believe that once Israel takes the necessary steps and stops its intransigent approach, the normalization of our relations will be the natural outcome."

Guney emphasized that Turkey wishes to be Israel's friend. "Our relations and friendship had stood the test of time. They had always emerged strong and enduring. And we do not wish this to change. Turkey and Israel live in a tough neighbourhood. It is not very wise to stay apart while there are tectonic changes in the Middle East."

Referring to the diplomatic stalemate between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, Guney said, "If Israel pursues peaceful policies in the region, then the pace of improvement in our relations will be unprecedented."

Claiming that the Israeli government's policies toward the Palestinians have isolated Israel, Guney said that Israeli settlements in the territories and the siege of Gaza are incompatible with achieving a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Israel has "legitimate security concerns," he said. "But to address those concerns, it is imperative to push the peace process forward. Israel needs to see that it will only be possible to ensure real security by building a real peace.

> 'The only way to reach a viable and lasting peace is through a two-state solution. Israel needs to live and prosper within secure borders, and this target can only be reached by the formation of a Palestinian state next to Israel'

"The only way to reach a viable and lasting peace is through a two-state solution. Israel needs to live and prosper within secure borders, and this target can only be reached by the formation of a Palestinian state next to Israel."

Suggesting that Turkey's bilateral ties with Israel can be upgraded in the future, Guney said, "We have to act with utmost care not to stain the collective memory of past generations in both countries. If Israeli politicians have the same understanding and vision, I believe it should not be a matter for them to apologize and compensate."

He said Erdogan is antagonistic to neither Israel nor Jews. "Is it fair to label someone 'hostile to Israel' simply because he does not agree with the policies pursued toward the Palestinians?"

Elaborating on this point, Guney said, "Prime Minister Erdogan has stressed that antisemitism is a crime against humanity." And, he went on to say that Erdogan was the first Turkish prime minister who paid a visit to (Turkey's) chief rabbi.

'A universal cause of helping children is a good one'

"Because it's so rare, not a lot of funding is available for research for it," Brooks said, adding that she's grateful for the support.

"There is a long way to go to find a cure. Every little bit helps."

Mars Hotel drummer Jordan Lampert is confident he and his band will be able to add a few thousand dollars to the cause later this month.

Mars Hotel, a Grateful Dead tribute band, will join Rory Levy of the Gratefully Deadicated Sound System, a DJ who will mix high-quality concert recordings in a seamless set with the band.

"When Rory suggested we play a gig that benefits Jake, that spurred us on to make this happen," said Lampert, who is a longtime friend of Brooks' brother, Ryan.

As a father of two himself, Lampert said it didn't take much convincing to get involved in this initiative.

"Especially when you have kids, you'd never wish for any kid to have to go through a health issue like this," he said.

"If there is anything any of us can do to help kids that are going through this or kids who may have to go through it in the future... I just think it's a cause that everyone can rally around. A universal cause of helping children is a good one."

Lampert said he hopes to attract about 400 people to the show, which would garner about $4,000 for the cause.

May we all be 'Hartmanized'

Rabbi Shalom Spira

Gil Troy's excellent column in The CJN last July focused on the theology of Rabbi David Hartman. Troy cogently observed that "this rabbi of reason and reach has now posed a serious challenge to his Orthodox colleagues. It is incumbent upon them to read, respond – and maybe even reformulate, if not reform."

Accordingly, I would like to fulfil Troy's request by responding to Rabbi Hartman.

As a note of introduction, I acknowledge that I am deeply indebted to Rabbi Hartman, because I was privileged to be raised in the Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem community that he founded. Although I was born only after he ascended to Eretz Yisrael, the influence of Rabbi Hartman has permeated TBDJ and hence has spiritually enriched my life.

Rabbi Hartman's theology focuses on the duty to care and be sensitive to the needs of other human beings. I submit that Rabbi Hartman has praiseworthily encapsulated the doctrine of Orthodox Judaism. After all, Rabbi Akiva declares unequivocally in the Sifra (the halachic midrash to Leviticus) that "You shall love your fellow as yourself" (Leviticus 19:18) is a major principle of the Torah. We would all be wise to follow Rabbi Hartman's leadership and incorporate his righteous emphasis upon sensitivity to others in our quotidian lives.

Simultaneously, the same Torah that commands us to love others also gives us a panoply of other sacrosanct mitzvot, all of which are eternal, as Maimonides writes in Hilchot Yesodei HaTorah. These mitzvot include the interdiction against a kohen marrying a convert, the disqualification of a bill of divorce when the husband is coerced, and the obligation for separation between deceased Jews and deceased Noahides in a cemetery.

Still, on the matter of protecting the Jewish wife, the oral Torah allows for a prenuptial agreement that empowers the bride before the marriage begins, protecting her from becoming an agunah in the future. Inspired by Rabbi Hartman and Troy, an essay on how to draft the appropriate agreement has been published at www.wepapers.com/Papers/213069/Prenuptial_Agreement.

As an overarching principle, Rabbi Hartman cites the Talmud in Yoma 69b, which declares that the Creator wants people to address Him in a truthful manner. Rabbi Hartman is absolutely correct. That passage of the Talmud relates to prayer, establishing that one may not lie to the Holy One, Blessed Be He, when praying to Him. And, to that effect, the Torah is pure truth (Psalms 119:142), thereby inspiring us to uphold the mitzvot of the Torah, all of which are eternal. As the Talmud elucidates in Yoma 22b, Ecclesiastes 7:16 teaches us to champion the mitzvot, even when they transcend human understanding.

In conclusion, I believe that world Jewry is privileged to benefit from Rabbi Hartman's noble teachings, when applied as elaborated by the present article. May we be "Hartmanized" accordingly, thereby allowing us to serve as a source of blessing to all humanity, as per Genesis 12:3.

Rabbi Spira is spiritual leader of Congregation Kol Yehouda in Cote St. Luc, Que.

Jewish numbers

From the 1880s to the 1920s, some two million east European Jews immigrated to America.

Most of the world's 13 million Jews live in North America and Israel. Jewish leaders in both countries continue to assert the centrality of Israel for a vital Jewish future. They maintain that without the Diaspora's influence, Israel will become parochial, and without Eretz Yisrael, the Diaspora will inevitably assimilate.

According to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, between 160,000 and 180,000 German Jews perished in the Holocaust. After World War II, a small Jewish community gradually emerged. However, beginning in the 1990s, a significant number of Russian Jews immigrated to the newly united Germany, and by 2004, the Jewish population had reached 118,000.

Approximately 20,000 Jews live in Poland, but only a fraction are members of Jewish communal institutions. But recent efforts to revive Jewish life is achieving surprising success.

The 600,000 Jews in South Florida (the Miami metropolitan area) are about 10 per cent of the area's population, and make up the third-largest percentage of Jews in any major U.S. metropolitan area. They represent about 10 per cent of Jews in the United States.

There are approximately 1.5 million Reform Jews who belong to more than 900 Reform congregations in the United States and Canada.

The Reform movement began ordaining women in 1972. There are now several hundred female rabbis, as well as female cantors, synagogue presidents and other religious leaders.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

This now holds true also for Conservative and Reconstructionist forms of Judaism.

The Cambridge Encyclopaedia of Judaism and Culture estimates that the number of haredi Jews is 300,000 in North America, 500,000 in Israel and another 75,000 in Canada, Europe and Latin America.

More than a million Conservative Jews live in the United States, and another 100,000 in Canada, Europe, Latin America and Israel. In 1975, more American Jews were affiliated with Conservative synagogues than with those of any other denomination. By the 1990s, however, membership was in decline.

In the 1970s, about 25 per cent of North American Jews were married to non-Jews. By the 1990s, that figure had doubled to 52 per cent. In recent years, many intermarried Jews continued to identify with the community and are eager to raise their children as Jews. This presents problems in Jewish law when the non-Jewish parent is the mother.

In 1983, the Reform movement adopted the principle that the children of one Jewish parent, male or female, are presumed to be Jewish if they become involved in public and formal acts of identification with the Jewish faith and Jewish People (mitzvot).

The Gerontology Research Group believes there's an 'invisible barrier' at age 115. There are only 12 undisputed cases of people ever reaching 115. Right now, according to GRG, 55 women and six men are over age 110 worldwide. The oldest age ever reached was 122, in 1997, by a French woman. No matter how little you eat, how much you exercise and how healthy you live, you apparently can't live longer than 125 years. In 5,000 years of recorded history, there's been no change in the maximum life span.

U.S. presidential candidates and Israel

My View

Lawrence Hart

To the outside observer, the run-up to the presidential nomination in the United States seems to go on forever, often exuding more bluster than substance. But inasmuch as all of the manoeuvring and one-upmanship might make for good theatre, the gravity of the issues facing America, and indeed the free world, cannot be underestimated and demands that whoever the Republicans select to take on President Barack Obama has the erudition and conviction to sculpt an alternative to current policies that clearly are not working.

It's well recognized that domestic concerns invariably determine who wins elections and, during the current cycle, understandably even more so than in previous years, it's the economy that will be uppermost in the minds of voters. Nonetheless, given so much political turbulence overseas, foreign policy begins to emerge as a secondary tipping point in the quest for the White House.

And within the context of foreign policy, the salient question for the Jewish community during the current primaries tends to focus mostly on "how good one or another of the Republican candidates would be for Israel." Fortunately, with the exception of Texas congressman Ron Paul, there appears to be little to be worried about, with all of the remaining contenders strongly declaring their support for the Jewish state in ways that appeal to their constituencies.

Frontrunner Mitt Romney has stated that "the bonds between Israel and the United States are unshakable." He has pledged that if he's elected president, his first foreign trip will be to Israel. In contrast, Paul has stuck with his reportedly anti-Israel sentiments, contending, for example, that previous American alignment with Israel contributed to the 9/11 attacks. He is adamant that all U.S. aid to Israel should cease forthwith.

Ranking candidates on the strengths of their commitments to Israel, Jerusalem Post columnist Dovid Efune places former U.S. senator Rick Santorum at the top of the list. Santorum has described Obama's Middle East policy as "immoral" and has expressed his fervent belief in Israel's rights to the West Bank, even going so far as to controversially insist that "all the people who live in the West Bank are Israelis; they're not Palestinians."

Efune characterizes another of his more favoured candidates, Newt Gingrich, as having views that "translate into nuanced and comprehensive pro-Israel policy." As with many of the other candidates, Gingrich embraces Jerusalem as "the undivided capital of the Jewish state".

Texas Governor Rick Perry has promised that, among his first acts as president, he would move the U.S. embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Former Utah governor Jon Huntsman also endorses such a move. He has described the U.S.-Israeli relationship as "a special bond rooted in history and solidified over more than five decades of partnership."

The real race for the Republican nomination is just getting started and although Romney is the odds-on favorite, it's too early to predict who will come away with the prize. But in terms of "who is good for Israel," each one, aside from Paul, passes muster. The bigger question is who has the ability to unseat Obama.

Israeli ecotourism

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

If you are a veteran visitor to Israel but would like a break from Jerusalem's crowds and Tel Aviv's nightlife, you're in luck. Consider an ecotour. Although Israel may not spring to mind as a natural choice for environment-friendly vacations, the compact country has developed an impressive array of activities for tourists who want to see nature up close and aren't afraid to break a sweat.

The International Ecotourism Society defines ecotourism as "responsible travel to natural areas that conserves the environment and improves the well-being of local people." [http://bit.ly/ecoisr1]

However, support for ecotourism isn't universal. Critics say flying around the world just to see a country's natural splendour does more harm than good and that genuine supporters of the environment should understand that they could end up being part of the problem. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr2]

Start at not-for-profit Ecotourism Israel, which gives a good overview of the country's natural sites and other destinations, including organic farms and ecological guesthouses. Who knew you could rent a cabin in the Golan to learn about bee life and honey making; go horseback riding along the Galilee, pausing to see the lights of Tiberias and Lake Kinneret; stay at a Negev bed and breakfast where you can learn about desert winemaking or practise your archery skills while hiking through the natural desert terrain of Mitzpe Ramon? [http://bit.ly/ecoisr3]

Many tour guides offer ecotours for which they do all the planning. But if you are more of a do-it-yourself traveller, the Israeli Ministry of Tourism website offers four-, seven- and 10-day ecotourism itineraries that you can customize to your needs. The longest tour starts in the Golan at the organic farm in the talmudic village of Katsrin and delivers you 10 days later in the Negev at the World Heritage Site of Avdat, "a city built by the Nabateans as a stop along the Incense Route they created from Petra to Gaza." [http://bit.ly/ecoisr4]

Actually, respect for the environment is nothing new in the land of the Torah. Neot Kedumim is a nature reserve dedicated to restoring the flora and fauna of biblical Israel. Located halfway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the reserve's eco-tour focuses on ancient, and current, practices, including the Sabbath and the sabbatical of the land, the laws of gleaning and tithes, and the biblical requirement to protect fruit trees. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr5]

If you prefer to do your ecotouring in an urban environment, consider volunteering at Jerusalem's Abraham Hostel "and experience the holy city through an ecological lens." Goals of the hostel include "recycling and waste-management initiatives, organic gardening and compost, interaction with the communities that directly surround it, including Meah Shearim and east Jerusalem." [http://bit.ly/ecoisr6]

And who knew that planting trees would ever become trendy? Let's not forget that the venerable Jewish National Fund planted its first grove of olive trees more than a century ago, a practice since adopted by thousands of tourists (and even more via donations to the fund's famous blue boxes). If you visit Israel on an ecotour, you can marvel at those forests and get some dirt under your fingernails. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr7]

How to stick to new year's goals

Happy New Year everyone!

When you read this, it will be a few weeks into January 2012, which is often the time that we all begin to teeter-totter on our New Year's resolutions.

I actually prefer to call resolutions "goals," because resolutions for some reason just don't end up working for people. I also believe that one or two goals are often all you need to get a jump-start on the new year.

Life Coach Corner

A great question to ask yourself is: "What do I want in 2012?" Keep it simple, and whether it's more healthy eating and fitness, weight loss, getting started on that novel, taking some singing or dancing lessons, starting a new business, learning to play the violin or just some personal fulfilment, begin by writing it down to make it happen.

If it's writing a book, commit to the outline and a few chapters by a certain date. A good friend, Nancy, just told me that she is doing a five-kilometre run in February to prepare for a longer 10-kilometre run on Mother's Day. That is a fantastic way to approach a bigger project – just break it up into tiny parts.

So what are the things that trip people up the most when it comes to resolutions? Well, to start with, we make too many of them. Choose just one or two really good ones. And if you want to lose weight, make it specific. Write down, "I want to lose 20 pounds" and then give it a realistic date. Partnering with someone can be very powerful, whether it's a friend, partner or life coach. Write down exactly how you want to achieve your goal. So if it's weight loss, you may want to join a gym or hire a personal trainer until you achieve your goal weight. Keep a journal or diary and tick off each accomplishment as you achieve it.

What also gets in the way for people, in addition to being too vague about their goals, is letting your inner critic stand in your way, with comments like this: "Who are you kidding?" So just silence that inner gremlin and keep on going!

I can't emphasize enough how much it helps to have a friend or loved one work with you on your goal. Two friends losing weight together or doing a fitness program can be even more successful. Choose someone close to you, whether it's a friend or a professional, to help you finally accomplish what you wish for, whether it's a dream to write and star in a movie or to organize your closets and cupboards and make your physical environment more pleasing and enjoyable.

Make sure to do something toward your goal every day, even if it's just the tiniest action. So, this sometimes could be as simple as visualizing your goal, making a phone call or doing some research around your goal, or even just clipping a magazine photo that reminds you of what you are wishing for. Please e-mail me with your goals for the new year. I'd love to hear from you.

I want to wish you all a Happy, Healthy, Loving and Fulfilling New Year! And finally, as comedian Joey Adams says: "May all your troubles last as long as your New Year's resolutions."

יש דברים שאסור לראות,
תשמור על העולם ילד
אם תראה תפסיק לחיות,
גיבור של העולם ילד
עם חיוך של מלאכים,
תשמור על העולם ילד
כי אנחנו כבר לא יכולים."

Fundraisers will send kids to camp

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Two upcoming events will raise money to send Toronto-area kids area to camp.

On Jan. 29, a Singing for S'Mores concert will be held at 7 p.m. at Temple Sinai Congregation to help send children to URJ Camp George, as well as to benefit the American Conference of Cantors (ACC), an affiliate of the Union for Reform Judaism. The ACC initiative is one of a number of partnerships between the organization and North American camps to raise money for camp tuition and for the ACC's social justice initiatives.

On March 1, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will hold a ping-pong tournament called SMASH to help send Jewish kids from low-income families to Jewish summer camp. The tournament will feature celebrity participants Aaron Douglas, Kiowa Gordon and Ivan Sergei, all actors; former NHLer Gary Leeman; talk-show host John Salley and recording artist Shawn Desman.

Campers enjoy a song session at Camp George in 2010.

Money raised at Singing for S'mores will go to Camp George's scholarship fund. A complete summer – seven weeks – at the Parry Sound camp runs just under $7,000 per camper.

There is no admission being charged for the concert. Instead, organizers are requesting that audience members "pay what you may." The first such event, held in May 2009, raised just over $4,000, enough to send a child to the camp for one half-summer session.

The program will feature cantors, cantorial soloists, the Leo Baeck Glee Club and two community choirs: Lachan, the Jewish Chamber Choir, and the Toronto Jewish Chorus.

Of the more than 500 campers at Camp George, one in five receives "some sort of assistance," camp director Jeff Rose told The CJN. He said the number of requests for subsidies has increased over the past few years. Funding is available through the camp's scholarship fund, as well as through federation's Top Bunk program, an incentive program for first-time campers at a Jewish camp.

Cantor Katie Oringel of Temple Sinai Congregation, an organizer of the concert, said that her experience with Jewish music at summer camp led her to the cantorate.

Becoming a faculty member at Camp George is "something I always dreamed of doing, and it brings me a lot of joy."

She noted that in addition to liturgical and Israeli music, the concert will feature Broadway tunes and pieces that refer to a theme of "What I learned from camp," including ideas like long-lasting friendships.

Cantor David Rosen, cantor of Beth Radom Congregation, who is also helping organize the event, added that this will be "one of the first times that all the Reform congregations are coming together to do something." As well, he noted, his own congregation, which is part of the project, is Conservative.

The proceeds of SMASH, the federation event, will go to UJA's camping subsidy program administered by Jewish Family & Child and JIAS Toronto. The program administers over $500,000 a year to help more than 1,000 children attend Jewish day and overnight camps who otherwise wouldn't be able to participate, said Steven Shulman, UJA's campaign director and counsel.

"There continues to be great need," he added.

SMASH organizers expect to have 40 teams of three people, each of which has been asked to raise a minimum of $3,000 from sponsors. As of last week, about 20 teams had signed up.

"In terms of building Jewish identity, summer camp is a particularly effective way to do it. You have a very positive association with [campers'] Jewish identity resulting from the camp experience," Shulman said.

Ping-pong, in addition to being "hot" at the moment, is an activity that many kids have played at summer camp, Shulman said.

The UJA event, chaired by Julie Albert and Jay Silber, will take place at Koolhaus on Queen's Quay E. in Toronto. The 7 p.m. tournament will be preceded by a cocktail reception. An information night is being held Jan. 31 at SPIN Toronto. For more information, contact Shimmy Wenner at federation, 416-631-5699, or go to ujasmash.com

"FOREVER YOUNG"

It is with profound sadness that we mark the 7th anniversary of the loss of our beautiful and courageous Zoe. There are no words that can convey the depths of our longing for her.

This year we would have celebrated Zoe's 27th birthday. Instead we are left remembering her joyous short life with profound sadness and sorrow. Not a day goes by that Zoe is not in our thoughts and dreams and hearts – forever our shining star. Zoe remains deeply missed by her parents Judy and Steve, her sister Lindsay and husband Ari, her Grandma Rhoda and all of her special family and friends.

Zoe, we love and miss you more than words ....

B.C. paper publishes antisemitic editorial

Troubles of the world blamed on Zionism

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter
Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

A leading Indo-Canadian newspaper last week published an antisemitic column that called Zionism a cancer.

In rambling screed published Jan. 7 in the Vancouver-based South Asian Link, Sawraj Singh, an Ellensburg, Wash.-based surgeon and chair of both the Washington State Network for Human Rights and of the Central Washington Coalition for Social Justice, wrote that the troubles of the world are directly attributable to the triple "cancers" of racism, capitalism and Zionism.

David Koschitzky

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) blasted the article, calling it "replete with conspiracy theories" and "numerous offensive statements concerning Jews and Israel."

"We deplore this hateful column and call on The Link to immediately remove it from online, publish a retraction, and issue an apology," CIJA chair David Koschitzky said in a statement last week. "It does the Indo-Canadian community, which has been and remains such a valuable contributor to Canada, no credit for one of its key community newspapers to be spreading such disturbing lies."

Among other things, Singh's article calls the United States "the mother of the cancers of racism, capitalism, and Zionism."

"The Jews were and still are able to monopolize most of the academic and intellectually demanding positions. It is very interesting to compare the percentage of Jews amongst doctors, attorneys, university professors, and scientists in America to any European country, and even to Canada," Singh wrote.

"The truth is that the Jews are represented in far greater numbers in these professions than their population in America (the same is becoming true of the Indians now). The result of this situation is that America has taken an anti-Islamic, anti-Palestinian and anti-Arab stand, as compared to Europe or Canada."

His column also claims that the United States is responsible for cancers afflicting various Latin American leaders, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, as well as that American doctors are performing illegal medical experiments on America's Latino and black prison populations and that AIDS was first introduced as a pathogen by white European doctors into the population of the Belgian Congo.

Reached by phone in Vancouver last week, Paul Dhillon, editor-in-chief of The Link, defended printing the column.

"We don't support his opinion but he's a regular contributor to the paper," Dhillon said, adding that Singh has been a contributor for more than five years.

The Link has a readership of between 30,000 to 40,000 people and is available online and as a weekly paper, Dhillon said.

He said accusations that the article is antisemitic are unfounded.

"This column is not directed at Jews. Read it in context. He's giving it in terms of America's history, pointing out that Indians are in the same category. The point he's making is that the West's anti-Arab stance is brought on by the Jewish lobby," he said. "If it's a fact that there's a lot of Jews in intelligentsia and academia, it's a fact. He's saying the Indians are getting there now, too. He's not saying it's a bad thing. If Jews are worthy, they come up at the top."

When pressed about the column calling Zionism a "cancer," Dhillon said he didn't agree with the opinion, but admitted his columnist may have crossed a line.

"Sometimes an opinion writer gets carried away," he said.

Asked what his paper's stance is on the existence of Israel, Dhillon replied: "I believe it has a right to exist. That's the origins of the Jews. It's definitely a legitimate state. Our paper doesn't take any line to the contrary like that."

When asked about Singh's comment that Jews "monopolize" academia in order to foment anti-Arab sentiment, Dhillon said he also didn't agree with that statement or that Jews control the world or have infiltrated the ranks of academia for any nefarious reason.

"I don't agree with that, but I don't think [Singh is] implying Jews control the world, just that they possess great intelligence," he said.

Jewish organizations were still calling for the article's removal last week from The Link's website, where it was still available as of The CJN's deadline.

"Among many distasteful corruptions of history, this article uses historic antisemitic accusations – including the depiction of the Jewish people as power-hungry, and even a disease – to attack the world's only Jewish state and its supporters," Koschitzky said. "This is an alarming example of the convergence of anti-Zionism and antisemitism, starkly displayed as a leading editorial in a Canadian newspaper."

Avi Benlolo, CEO of the Toronto-based Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, called it a blatant example of "pure antisemitic hatred" and one of the worst he's ever seen.

"I question the judgment and bias of the editors who posted it," he said. "This article should be immediately pulled from the website. Hate is not a Canadian value."

Corrections

The article "Chabad Ontario launches overnight camp" (Jan. 12) included incorrect information. The girls' session at Camp Gan Israel will be in July, and the boys' session will be in August. The CJN regrets the error.

Antisemitic incident reported in high school

Myron Love

WINNIPEG — Five Grade 12 students at Murdoch MacKay Collegiate in east Winnipeg have been suspended indefinitely after one of them posted a racist and antisemitic photo on his Facebook page.

The photo reportedly shows the students posing behind a dirty SUV with swastikas and antisemitic and racist statements scrawled in the dust on the back window. The school is in the background.

It's the second time in two months that an antisemitic incident has taken place at a Winnipeg high school. In the earlier case, two high school students in southwest Winnipeg are facing assault and hate charges as a result of threatening a Jewish girl at the school with a lighter and singeing her hair.

While there is no specific victim in the second case – and media interviews with other Murdoch MacKay students who know the teens in the photo said the offenders aren't racist and the photo was just a prank – the school's administration and the local superintendent are taking the incident seriously.

"All the students involved are being dealt with," said Dennis Pottage, superintendent of the River East Transcona School Division, which counts Murdoch MacKay Collegiate among its schools.

The students' suspensions are of an indefinite length, depending on the results of interviews with them. "Students showing remorse and contrition will be back at school sooner than those who don't," Pottage said last week. "If it turns out to be one specific student's idea, he will be out longer."

Pottage expressed embarrassment that such an incident occurred in his district. "Something like this shouldn't be occurring in River East Transcona division," he said. "The students may not have understood the severity of their actions, but what they did is completely inappropriate. The key thing is that we want them to learn from this."

Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community affairs director, has offered to help the school and school division in developing anti-racist education programs. "I am hoping that this is more a case of misguided students using inappropriate symbolism and terminology rather than students with real antisemitic and racist views."

There are few, if any, Jewish residents in the area around Murdoch MacKay or among its student body.

1,900 people respond to challenge

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

At the crack of dawn during a sunrise hike in Eilat, a young man perches himself on a jagged mountain face, overlooking the Red Sea and the blue sky.

His girlfriend, 19-year-old Ronnie Friedman, notices him indulging in a peaceful moment.

With an eye and a passion for photography, she calls out to him, "Pose! Pose for me!"

Little did she know that the photo she took would translate into a free, round-trip ticket to Israel.

Last September, Taglit-Birthright Israel held a photography contest open to all North American Birthright alumni.

Jacob Dallal, Birthright's associate director of communications and marketing who is based in New York, challenged Birthrighters to submit images that capture the essence of Israel and the Birthright experience.

Dallal said about 1,900 people responded.

"We got photos of landscapes and people and everything under the sun."

After narrowing thousands of submissions down to 100, he commissioned a professional photographer who used a better-trained eye to select the best 18.

From there, the top 18 photos were put to a Facebook vote. The winner was chosen based on who could garner the most Facebook "likes."

It was a tight race between the first- and second-place photos, but by the end of the contest, Friedman, a second-year advertising student at OCAD University, edged out her competition by less than 60 votes.

"Photography has been a part of my life since I can remember," Friedman said.

"I own three cameras, and I always have a camera on me at all times. It's mainly a hobby, but I try to make it more than that. That's why I'm in advertising," she said, adding that she'd love to be able to incorporate photography into her career.

Friedman, who travelled to Israel on Birthright in May with her boyfriend, Robbie Frank, said winning this contest – and a round-trip ticket to Israel with El Al – was a very validating experience for her.

"I'm definitely looking for more contests to enter," she said.

Dallal said he hopes to organize a photo exhibit of the best images from the contest at the Knesset in Jerusalem next spring.

"These aren't professional photographers, but sometimes when you see Israel through the eyes of those who are experiencing it, it actually makes for some very beautiful material," Dallal said.

Check out the top 18 photos at http://tinyurl.com/7c4ujyr or visit the Heebonics blog at www.heebonics.ca, where they've been posted.

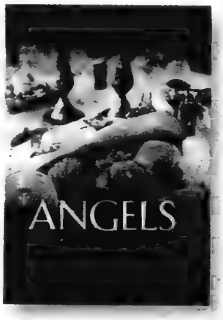
All about Shabbat at home

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

Yvette Miller is an Orthodox woman in Chicago who became observant over the years and made Shabbat observance a serious and significant part of her life. She is married with four children, ages two to nine, teaches Sunday school and contributes to Jewish websites.

Her book, Angels at the Table is really a basic primer for the person who has no knowledge about Shabbat and how to observe it, or for someone who wants a reference work to any aspect of the 25 hours of Shabbat observance.



The 15 chapters of useful advice provide step by step instructions and include an overview of Shabbat, the rules and laws, Shabbat evening, Shabbat dinner table blessings, Shabbat dinner and after, Shabbat early morning, Shabbat morning services, Shabbat lunch, Shabbat afternoon, Saturday evening, Torah questions for the Shabbat table, songs for Shabbat, activities on Shabbat and 69 traditional recipes.

While the recipes are really good, the style in which they are presented leaves something to be desired. Recipes go from one page to another, and instructions are not numbered and are sometimes simplistic (e.g., zest the lemon – grate the lemon's shiny yellow surface). She neglects to tell readers to preheat the oven, and sometimes when the recipe is cooked on the stovetop burner, she forgets to mention what kind of pan to use.

The book concludes with the blessings after a meal and an appendix.

She includes the tiniest details. For example, in the "Shabbat early morning" chapter, she discusses awakening prayers, the mindset, breakfast, dressing (including kippah and tzitzit), women's hats, modesty, makeup and hair on Shabbat, and the unchanging aspects of Jewish dress and behaviour.

Her style is chatty and personal without being preachy, and that's one aspect of the book that makes it enjoyable, even if you know the rules, laws and customs. There is history, there are anecdotes, and the reader really comes to know Miller.

This would be a great gift for someone embarking on conversion or considering becoming observant, someone whose knowledge of Shabbat is rudimentary, or a newly married couple or a family with young children exploring how they want to relate to Shabbat observance.

Here are some Shabbat recipes from the book.

1 whole raw chicken
2 tbsp. olive oil
large dash salt
large dash pepper
large dash garlic powder
1-2 sliced onions
4-5 sliced garlic cloves (optional)
1/4 cup fresh herbs – sage, rosemary, tarragon (optional)

Optional rub:
1 lemon zest and juice
2 tbsp. virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. cumin
large dash salt

Preheat oven to 400. Place chicken in a roasting pan, feet side down. Sprinkle with oil, then salt, pepper and garlic powder. Scatter onion slices around the chicken, and place a few onion slices in cavity and under skin. (As an option, place garlic and/or herbs under skin too.)

Lightly cover chicken with foil, leaving an opening between the foil and pan. Place in oven and bake at 400 for 1-2 hours until skin is crisp and golden brown and juices run clear when you prick the chicken above the thigh.

To make rub, grate the shiny skin of the lemon and combine with juice, oil, paprika, cumin, salt and pepper. Spread on chicken skin before roasting. Serves 6.

Iran confirms receipt of U.S. blockade warning

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Iran confirmed on Sunday that it received a message from the United States regarding the Strait of Hormuz in the Persian Gulf, but it did not reveal the contents of the message, news agencies reported Sunday.

Iranian generals have warned that they could close the Strait of Hormuz, a vital international oil route in the Persian Gulf – thus blocking a considerable share of global oil exports – if oil sanctions were imposed.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Ramin Mehmanparast was quoted as saying Tehran had not yet decided if it would reply to the letter, the contents of which he did not detail.

"America's message over the Strait of Hormuz reached us through three channels. It was given to our UN representative, the Swiss ambassador conveyed it to the Foreign Ministry, and also Iraqi President Jalal Talabani gave the message to Iran," Mehmanparast said, according to Iran's ISNA news agency.

"If we deem it is necessary to give a response to America's message, then we will reply to it. The issue is being reviewed by Iran and it will be done in an appropriate way."

Tehran and Washington have had no direct diplomatic relations since 1979 and the Swiss Embassy represents U.S. interests in Iran.

Tehran said on Saturday it had sent a letter to Washington with evidence that U.S. intelligence services were involved in the assassination of Iranian nuclear scientist Mostafa Ahmadi-Roshan last week.

Washington has said it would not tolerate any closure of the strait, the export route for one-third of all seaborne traded oil. U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta has said such a move would require a response.

Tensions between the two countries have increased in recent weeks. U.S. President Barack Obama signed a bill on New Year's Eve that, if fully implemented, would make it impossible for most countries to pay for Iranian oil.

In addition to threats of closing Hormuz, Iran has started enriching uranium at an underground bunker and sentencing an Iranian-American citizen to death on spying charges.

Negotiations between the West and Iran over Tehran's nuclear program stalled a year ago.

Meanwhile, a number of media outlets are reporting this week that Iran has agreed to reopen discussions with the International Atomic Energy Agency later this month about its nuclear program, which it maintains is purely civilian in nature.

In related news, a Sunday Times report said Monday that Mossad agents were behind last week's assassination of Roshan.

According to the report, the assassination was similar to that seen in "espionage films" – planned over a period of many months, and including extensive surveillance and intelligence gathering. The Sunday Times quoted an unnamed Israeli source who claimed the killing was a precursor to a military strike that would make rebuilding nuclear facilities more difficult for Iran, should they be bombed.

Mossad agents reportedly behind assassination of nuclear scientist

The report further claimed that small groups of Israeli Mossad agents had carefully observed key areas in Tehran deemed relevant to Roshan's assassination.

"There is zero tolerance for mistakes. By nature, every failure not only risks the neck of the agents but also risks turning into an international scandal," the Israeli source said.

According to the Sunday Times, Roshan, 32, was monitored from a makeshift control room in a safe house nearby as he was preparing to leave for work. Israeli agents were also watching the entrance to Iranian intelligence headquarters in the city centre, when they noticed a number of cars and people running, followed by police rushing into the nearby streets. Another agent monitoring radio traffic between the Tehran police and security forces confirmed unusual activity, the paper said.

The report states that as Roshan's bodyguard was driving him to Natanz uranium enrichment site, where he served as director, a masked person on a motorbike weaved through traffic and planted a bomb on the car shaped to deliver its full force at the passenger.

The Sunday Times report stated that hundreds of regime supporters swore revenge at Roshan's funeral on Friday. "Two targets were always in Mustafa's mind," Reza Najafi, a friend, said. "To fight Israel and to become a shaheed [martyr]. He achieved both his targets."

The United States ruled out any connection to the assassination. "We were not involved in any way with regard to the assassination that took place there," Panetta said, although he did hint that he had "some idea" of who was.

The report also said the British Foreign Office stated that it had "no involvement whatsoever" in the attack.

Haredim protest arrest of leaders

Hundreds of haredi protesters tried to block roads around Jerusalem's Kikar Hashabbat (Sabbath Square) in the Mea She'arim neighbourhood Sunday, after six prominent members of the community were arrested earlier in the day on suspicion of financial-related crimes. Three demonstrators have been arrested so far.

Eda Haredit organization leader Rabbi Yitzhak Tuvia Weiss, said the arrest of the six is as if he himself was arrested. His followers understood his statement as a call to use all possible means to protest the arrests.

Approximately 200 protesters gathered in the area, and a large number of police were called to the scene to prevent serious clashes. A protest against the arrests was also held in Beit Shemesh outside Jerusalem.

Israel Police and the tax authorities claim the arrests were made after a long investigation, during which evidence was gathered tying the suspects to felonies including theft of donations, tax evasion, money laundering and more.

Hackers hit Israeli sites

JTA

JERUSALEM — Computer hackers disabled the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and El Al websites.

The attacks on Monday morning came after hackers over the last two weeks have released online the credit card details of thousands of Israelis and a day after Hamas called on hackers to attack Israeli sites.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange's website recovered some operations by mid-Monday morning. Trading wasn't affected. The bourse's website and trading system are not connected. El Al's website was working by the afternoon.

A group of pro-Palestinian hackers calling themselves "Nightmare" had threatened Sunday to bring down the two websites, according to Ynet.

Also Monday, a Jewish pro-Israel hacker going by the moniker Hannibal published Facebook account information allowing access to the accounts of 20,000 Arab Facebook users. He also claims to have information to allow access to 10 million Iranian and Saudi bank accounts.

"The penetration into Israeli websites opens a new front for electronic resistance and war against the Israeli occupation," Hamas spokesperson Sami Abu Zuhri said Sunday.

Koschitzkys honoured at Leket Israel benefit

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Torontonians Henry and Julia Koschitzky were honoured earlier this month at the second annual gala dinner held by Leket Israel – The National Food Bank.

The benefit dinner raised funds for Leket's Gleaning the Land project, which sends thousands of volunteers into fields to gather produce and distribute it to those in need.

"The messages of this dinner were very specific – the power of volunteerism, the masses of people we need to succeed in the Gleaning Project and the power of the individual," Joseph Gitler, the founder of Leket Israel, told The CJN."

It was a Saturday night affair that drew nearly 700 people to the outskirts of Kfar Saba. Besides the Koschitzkys, A-list attendees included chairman of Iscar Metalworking, Eitan Wertheimer; Jewish Agency head Natan Sharansky; MK Zeev Bielski; consul general of Israel in Toronto, Amir Gissin.

Henry and Julia Koschitzky

"It is so painful to imagine in this day and age when Israel is an economic success that there is more poverty today than there was when Israel was a poor country," Gitler said.

"Leket didn't start because of poverty in the classic communities in Israel [Russian immigrants, Ethiopian immigrants, Bedouin, haredi]. It started because of the working poor – that's infuriating – working parents trying to take care of their families and cannot."

The new poor are the growing middle class, Gidi Kroch, CEO of Leket Israel, told guests at the event. "A family where two people are working but do not earn enough to put food on the table," he said.

Gitler, a New Yorker who made aliyah in 2000, started Leket Israel nine years ago. He assumed it wouldn't last for more than three months. He couldn't stand the amount of food being wasted and decided to deliver excess food from caterers to social service organizations in Raanana, Herzliya and Kfar Saba to the needy.

Within six months, Leket Israel purchased its first refrigerated delivery truck and opened a warehouse.

Toronto philanthropists Henry and Julia Koschitzky were among the first to help Leket Israel get off the ground.

"The Koschitzkys have been involved in Leket since the beginning. They were generous enough to help us buy our first vehicle through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto," Gitler told The CJN.

"They financially support us, which is very important, but they also counsel us in the organization. We want someone with their experience and you can't buy help like that. The Koschitzkys were very fitting honorees [of the gala dinner]."

Today, Leket Israel is a large operation. Thousands of volunteers and staff collect excess food slated for disposal, from event halls, corporate cafeterias, farmers, bakeries, etc., and redirect it to needy people at soup kitchens, daycare and seniors centres, homeless shelters and other organizations that serve those in need.

In 2011, Leket Israel rescued 9,000 tons of fresh fruit and vegetables. That equates to 700,000 hot meals, 90,000 loaves of bread and 13 million pounds of produce and perishable goods. Leket Israel provided food for 60,000 Israelis last year.

The organization runs nine projects, among them Gleaning the Land, Nighttime Meal Rescue and Sandwiches for Children. The Gleaning project was inspired by a Bible verse that states: When you reap your harvest in your field and forget a sheaf in the field, you shall not go back to get it; it shall be left for the alien, the orphan, and the widow, so that the Lord your God may bless you in all your undertakings. (Deuteronomy 24:19)

Israeli statistics show that a quarter of Israel's 7.7 million citizens – 1.9 million people – are living in poverty. Among them are some 850,000 children.

Unfortunately, said Gitler, there are thousands of organizations in Israel today providing food for the needy. However, Leket's approach is unique because it focuses on food rescue.

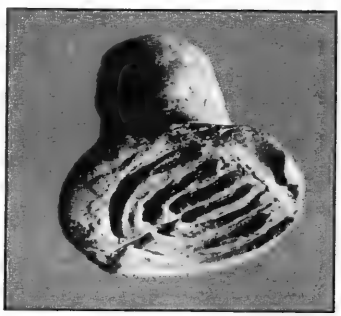
"I have mixed emotions about Leket's success," Gitler said. "All this wonderful food that we've been able to redistribute shows that Israel is a successful country and that there is this food. On the other hand, that there is so much demand disturbs all of us. I dream that there will be no one to give the food to."

1,500-year-old kosher bread stamp found near Acre

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A 1,500-year-old seal with the image of the seven-branched Temple menorah has been discovered near the city of Acre.

The ceramic stamp, which dates from the Byzantine period in the sixth century CE, was found during ongoing Israel Antiquities Authority excavations at Horbat Uza, east of Acre, which are being undertaken before the construction of the Acre-Carmiel railroad track.



It is thought the stamp was used to mark baked goods, and is known as a "bread stamp."

"A number of stamps bearing an image of a menorah are known from different collections. The Temple menorah, being a Jewish symbol par excellence, indicates the stamps belonged to Jews, unlike Christian bread stamps with the cross pattern, which were much more common in the Byzantine period," said Gilad Jaffe and Danny Syon, the directors of the excavation, on behalf of the Israel Antiquities Authority.

According to the excavation directors, this was the first time that a stamp of this kind has been found in a controlled archeological excavation, meaning that it is possible to determine where it comes from and when it was made.

"The stamp is important because it proves that a Jewish community existed in the settlement of Uza in the Christian-Byzantine period. The presence of a Jewish settlement so close to Acre – a region that was definitely Christian at this time - constitutes an innovation in archeological research," Syon said.

"Due to the geographical proximity of Horbat Uza to Acre, we can speculate that the settlement supplied kosher baked goods to the Jews of Acre in the Byzantine period," Jaffe and Syon added.

Horbat Uza is a small rural settlement where other archeological finds, a Shabbat lamp and jars with menorah patterns painted on them, have alluded to it having been a Jewish settlement.

The stamp bears the image of a seven-branched menorah, and the handle of the stamp is engraved with Greek letters. According to Leah Di Segni, of the Institute of Archaeology of Hebrew University of Jerusalem, this is probably the name Launtius, which was commonly used by Jews of the period and has appeared on other Jewish bread stamps.

"This is probably the name of the baker from Horbat Uza," Jaffe and Syon said.

Israelis safe after cruise ship grounded

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's Foreign Ministry revealed Friday night that seven Israelis were on board an Italian cruise ship that ran aground and keeled over near the coast of Tuscany Sunday.

According to the ministry, the three couples and one young girl were unharmed by the accident. The ministry was unaware of any other Israeli nationals on board.

Reports indicated that six people had died and 16 were still unaccounted for Monday morning. Around 70 people were injured, at least two seriously.

Authorities opened a criminal investigation for possible manslaughter charges against the ship's commander, Francesco Schettino, who was detained by police, Italian news agencies reported.

The vessel's operator, Costa Crociere, a unit of Carnival Corporation & Plc, the world's largest cruise operator, said it had been sailing on its regular course when it struck a submerged rock. In a television interview, the ship's commander said the rock was not marked on any maritime charts of the area.

However, it remained unclear how the 290-metre-long ship had been able to run aground in calm waters so close to the shore.

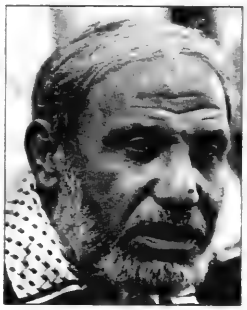
"We'll be able to say at the end of the investigation. It would be premature to speculate on this," said coastguard spokesman Filippo Marini.

Growing Islamism will boost Hamas: official

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUALEM — The coming rise of Islamism in the Arab world will strengthen support for the Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas, which will not give up its armed confrontation with Israel, senior Hamas official Mahmoud Al-Zahar said on Jan. 9.

If Western-backed Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas bets on peace talks with Israel rather than reconciling his Fatah movement with Hamas, he will lose out, Zahar said in an interview with Reuters in his Gaza office.



Mahmoud Al-Zahar

Fatah and Hamas have been bitter enemies since 2007 when the Islamists expelled Fatah and seized control of the Gaza Strip, which has been under Israeli blockade ever since. "The changing factors around us are in our favour… they are not in favour either of Fatah's project or those with whom it co-operates, including the Israeli enemy," he said, watched by his bodyguards.

"It all depends on Fatah's policy now," Zahar said. "If Fatah wants the [unity] agreement to be accomplished, we will be ready. If they do not want, then we are sitting here and the future is ours."

Zahar said Hamas was not prepared to relinquish the fight against Israel under any circumstances. He denied that Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal, based in Damascus, had endorsed Abbas's concept of non-violent "popular resistance" against Israel.

"Popular resistance includes both the Fatah agenda, which speaks of protests only, and the Hamas position, which advocates gathering all means of military armament for the sake of self-defence," Zahar said.

He foresaw a rising tide of Islamism in the Arab world that would strengthen the Palestinian cause.

"What is coming in Egypt, in Tunisia, in Libya and currently in Sudan is supportive of the Palestinian cause, not as in the past a strategic supporter of the Israeli occupation," he said.

"What is coming is a thousand times better than in the past. Therefore we have to invest in these achievements by the Arab street for the sake of achieving the fundamental goals of the Palestinian people, the liberation of land and the return of [refugees]," Zahar added.

Since its 1979 peace treaty, Egypt, along with Jordan, has been Israel's most reliable Arab partner in the Middle East. But the overthrow last February of Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak in the uprising inspired by popular revolution in Tunisia has created uncertainty over Egypt's future attitude toward Israel.

Zahar is a leading Hamas figure, seen by Fatah as a hardliner, who lost two sons in the fight against Israel. He is a senior negotiator in the reconciliation process with Fatah, which has been faltering almost since it was signed.

Zahar said Egypt, now ending a lengthy election process that will lead to a new constitution, is clearly destined to be ruled by "a sweeping Islamist party and a nationalist party" that will back the Palestinian cause.

The reconciliation agreement with Fatah, signed last May and sealed personally by Abbas and Meshaal last month in Cairo, may suffer if Abbas pursues peace talks with Israel, he warned.

Senior officials of the two sides have held talks in Amman, Jordan, recently after more than a year in suspension.

"Our doubts are really great, especially after these meetings in Amman," Zahar said. Hamas opposes acceptance of Israel and is ostracized by the West as a terrorist group that refuses to renounce violence. Israel has warned that striking a unity pact with Hamas would eliminate Abbas and Fatah as a potential partner for peace.

"Imagine that the Israeli enemy attacked us today or tomorrow… If we were attacked, we would respond by all possible means," Zahar said.

If Israel launched a military offensive into Gaza, Zahar said he bet Arab reaction would be stronger than in 2009 when 1,400 Palestinians were killed in Israel's three-week onslaught to stop rocket firing from Gaza into its territories. Thirteen Israelis were killed in that conflict.

"[Israel] could use the foggy political situation as the Arab nation still organizes itself ... to launch a new aggression against Gaza Strip," he said.

"They cannot accept that Gaza remains a painful and dangerous thorn in the future of the Israeli entity."

In related news, an adviser to Hamas' prime minister said the leader will visit Iran, Qatar and other Muslim countries at the end of the month.

Yusef Rizka says the militant group's Ismail Haniyeh will embark on his second international trip outside the Gaza Strip. He returned this week from a tour of Egypt, Sudan, Turkey and Tunisia.

It was the first time Haniyeh had left Gaza since Hamas seized control of the territory from the rival Fatah movement in 2007.

Hamas said the visits indicate the movement's increased international recognition and the growing influence of Islamic groups in the region.

The internationally recognized Palestinian Authority, which is dominated by Fatah, has been concerned by the warm welcome Haniyeh has received. It says his visits should be co-ordinated through Palestinian embassies.

Apple buys Israeli firm

Apple bought its first Israel-based company, Anobit Ltd., a flash storage solutions provider, for about $390 million. Apple had announced in December that it would open a development centre in Israel focusing on semiconductors, reportedly the first outside of its California headquarters.

Obama, Netanyahu speak

U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu discussed Iran and Middle East peace in a phone conversation last week. "They reviewed the recent meetings between Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in Amman and the president reaffirmed his commitment to the goal of a comprehensive and lasting peace in the region," the White House said in a statement. "The two leaders also discussed recent Iran-related developments, including the international community's efforts to hold Iran accountable for its failures to meet its international obligations. The president reiterated his unshakable commitment to Israel's security, and the president and the prime minister promised to stay in touch in the coming weeks on these and other issues of mutual concern," the statement said.

Domingo honoured

Spanish tenor Placido Domingo has been named a recipient of Israel's 2012 Wolf Prize. The award, valued at $100,000, was announced Jan. 11 in Jerusalem by Minister of Education and Wolf Foundation Council chair Gideon Sa'ar. It will be presented in May by President Shimon Peres in a special Knesset session. Domingo, 70, will share the Wolf Prize for the arts with English conductor Simon Rattle of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. It's the first time the prestigious prize has been awarded to a vocalist.

Claims Conference ועידת התביעות
The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany

PAYMENTS AVAILABLE TO ADDITIONAL HOLOCAUST VICTIMS FOLLOWING NEGOTIATIONS

Following negotiations with the German government, the Claims Conference has obtained changes to eligibility for the Article 2 Fund and the Hardship Fund, enabling certain additional Holocaust survivors to receive payments. All changes are effective January 1, 2012.

Article 2 Fund

Jewish Holocaust survivors may be eligible for a payment from the Article 2 Fund who do not already receive a pension from a German source (Article 2 Fund, CEEF, German Federal Indemnification Law – BEG – Bundesentschaedigungsgesetz, PRVG, Austrian OFG – Opferfürsorgegesetz, Israeli Ministry of Finance under the Nazi Persecution Disabled Persons law 5717-1957) and:

(i) were incarcerated in a ghetto as defined by the German Government for at least 12 months; or
(ii) lived in hiding for at least 12 months, under inhumane conditions without access to the outside world in Nazi-occupied territory and Nazi satellite states (Nazi instigation); or
(iii) lived under false identity for at least 12 months in Nazi-occupied territory and Nazi satellite states (Nazi instigation).

Holocaust survivors who are age 75 or over and who were incarcerated in a ghetto as defined by the German Government for at least three months (but for less than 12 months) and who do not already receive a pension from a German source (as listed above), may be eligible for a pension of €240 per month.

To be eligible, applicants must also meet the other criteria of the Article 2 Fund. Full details are at www.claimscon.org. Payments for approved Article 2 applications under these new criteria will be retroactive to the date that applications are received at the Claims Conference office, but no earlier than January 1, 2012.

Hardship Fund

Applicants may be eligible for a one-time payment of €2,556 from the Hardship Fund if they fled between June 22, 1941 and January 27, 1944 from areas of the Soviet Union that were up to 100 kilometers from the most easterly advance of the German army (Wehrmacht) but were not later occupied by the Nazis. Those eligible will include Jews who fled from Moscow and Stalingrad. Eligible victims will also include those who fled from Leningrad after June 22, 1941 but before the siege of that city commenced in September 1941.

To be eligible for the one-time payment from the Hardship Fund, applicants may not have received any previous compensation from a German source or receive a pension (as listed above under Article 2).

Hardship Fund payments may be made to eligible applicants who were citizens of certain Western European countries at the time of Nazi persecution and also at the time of that country's Global Agreement with Germany. "Western Persecutees" who think they may be eligible and have not already applied to the Hardship Fund should file an application. Western Persecutees are only eligible to receive a payment from the Hardship Fund if they have not received a previous payment from a German source, including from a Global Agreement.

Online coupon company hooks up with Internet radio

Pam Chiotti
Special to The CJN

How many mayors do you know of who have a radio station named after them? None, you say?

Ever hear of Mississauga, Ont., Mayor Hazel McCallion? She, along with a few thousand others, is all ears when it comes to Haze FM, the Internet radio station named in her honour.

It's a station that not only draws listeners from Mississauga – it also has listeners from around the globe. Yet, Haze FM is just one of thousands of Internet radio stations in North America that are tearing listeners away from conventional AM and FM radio and turning them into Internet radio junkies who are thrilled with radio that's mostly commercial free – for now anyway.

This dearth of commercials is exactly what interested a fledgling Jewish online coupon company, Deals Gone Crazy. Toronto residents Eleonora Rubinov and Ilan Liberman are the founders of www.dealsgonecrazy.com, a company that e-mails information about daily bargains to its subscribers. The company launched its site in November and first followed the traditional marketing route, using online pop-ups, e-mail blasts, hand-delivered flyers and word-of-mouth to spread the word. They even had a booth at Dr. Flea's flea market in Toronto, where they kibitzed with customers. Business trickled in, but it wasn't enough to stay afloat. The pair conceded that if ever they were going to grow, they'd need to ramp up their marketing campaign.

Aware of heavy competition, they looked at avenues that would set their company apart. "We're a startup" said Rubinov, "and the concept of advertising on Internet radio is also just beginning to make its mark – the same as us. We felt empathetic toward the medium. We know we can't grow on our own. Everyone has to help each other out and that's what we did."

They began a radio ad campaign on four Internet radio stations: www.d-moos.com (a station that broadcasts out of the McGibbon Hotel in Georgetown, Ont.), www.rtds.ca (Radio That Doesn't Suck, based in Toronto), www.swisssh.ca (based in Orillia, Ont.) and www.thehazefm.ca. The campaign comprises 30- and 60-second commercials, with some newscast and program sponsorship sprinkled in.

According to Statistics Canada, more than 80 per cent of the population used the Internet in 2010, and nearly 37 per cent of Canadians over 16 years of age listened to radio online. That works out to about 10 million people. Many listen to conventional radio that also streams online, but thousands of other listeners, are tuning in to stations that broadcast only on the Internet, where an eclectic mix of music, news and talk runs 24/7. While advertising on Internet radio is still in its infancy, infants grow up.

"We have 15,000-plus hours tuned each month," says Rob Reid, owner of Swisssh Radio. His listeners tune in from all over Europe and from as far away as Brazil, Vietnam, Australia and the United States. His station is also a favourite with Orillia residents.

"Commercial-free radio is what drew us to Internet radio," said Rubinov. "We thought that if someone heard a dozen or so songs in a row and then one commercial, our company would really stand out. And since we're an online company, we want to support Internet radio."

Clearly, as time progresses, more and more advertisers will be looking to "air" their radio commercials online, where cost is minimal and airplay is maximized. Rates for Internet radio are pennies on the dollar compared to terrestrial radio and print ads. And since Deals Gone Crazy is in the deals business, they knew where to look for a bargain.

With a mind to attract Jewish businesses in Toronto, and their feeling that the need was there, the Deals Gone Crazy executives approached merchants in Toronto's Jewish community.

"We keep kosher here at home," said Rubinov, "and I'd like to find some kosher establishments so I can go to more restaurants."

Right now, mostly hairdressers, spas, limousine and fitness-training services are Deals Gone Crazy's dominant advertisers, but with the company's new focus on restaurants, more food deals – kosher and non-kosher – are expected to appear in 2012. Thus, the new slogan: "Deals Gone Crazy: Get What You Dish For."

"Get What You Dish For" refers to a new approach that differentiates Deals Gone Crazy from other online coupon companies. "If somebody wants a particular deal, and we're hoping it's a restaurant, we try to secure it. If we do, that customer gets a free voucher," Liberman said.

But, most importantly, he continued, is their promise to keep customers coming back to the merchant once they've used their first voucher.

"Our marketing campaign is all about customer retention. It works… We put merchants first," said Liberman. "That's one of our trademarks."

The decision to invest in Internet radio is paying off. Liberman said the deals are coming in, and customers are appreciating saving money. "We've had at least 2,000 hits since we started advertising on Internet radio in November, and we've had people check out our site from as far away as Greece and Rome. People like the deals and are coming up with great suggestions." The customer base blossomed from a mere handful of subscribers to more than 700 hits after just four days of advertising on Internet radio.

Russ Horton, the man behind D-Moos Radio, said he's ecstatic about having Deals Gone Crazy on board. "They're the first company to throw their full support behind Internet radio," he said.

Liberman has become a big fan of Internet radio. "I've been hearing music I know and like, and I'm also hearing a lot of music and really creative programming that I haven't heard before. I'm excited to be part of this."

He admitted he was skeptical at first, wondering who exactly listens to Internet radio. But as he heard from Don Andrews, who has a late-night show on www.swisssh.ca, Internet radio listeners are fiercely loyal. Andrews, an Internet radio pioneer who is well-known from his days on conventional Toronto radio, said there are likely thousands of Internet stations across North America.

"I told a story on the air about a Vancouver woman who couldn't afford a plane ticket to Toronto to see her parents. One of my listeners phoned up. He works for an airline, and arranged for her to get a free flight. It's a nice thing to happen over the holidays. That's what Internet radio listeners are like," he said,

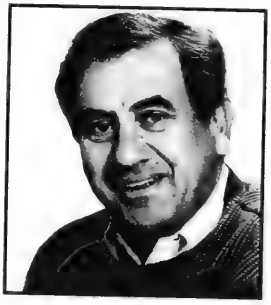
At the Galleries

• In his Museum of the Represented City, Toronto artist Flavio Trevisan creates an ephemeral "museum of the present" that reflects on the current state of Toronto and conveys a fragmented yet revealing cartography of its "built" history. Presented by the Koffler Gallery Off-Site at 80 Spadina Ave., Suite 501, the exhibit opens with a free reception on Jan. 19, 6 to 9 p.m., artist talk at 7 p.m. Continues to April 8.

• Israeli artist-filmmaker Yael Bartana, a rising star in the international art scene, made the award-winning film trilogy ...and Europe will be stunned, which is being shown in the Art Gallery of Ontario's Lind Gallery from Jan. 25 to April 1. The films focus on the Jewish Renaissance movement in Poland and the reaction to the return of the "long-unseen neighbour." Bartana will attend a public meet-the-artist program on Jan. 26, 7 to 8:30 p.m., in the AGO's Jackman Hall.



Larry Solway

Passages: Always opinionated and often passionate in discussion, Toronto radio personality Larry Solway was good at speaking his mind; his show, Speak Your Mind, ran on CHUM Radio in the late 1960s.

Solway, who died last week at the age of 83, also dabbled in movie acting, appeared on a CBC quiz show, wrote a couple of books and ran as an NDP candidate in St. Paul's riding in a provincial election in 1999. He leaves Shirley, his wife of 62 years, as well as children Joe and Beth.

Film classic portrays pre-state Israel

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Moshe Mizrahi's The House on Chelouche Street, released in 1973, is an Israeli classic nearly four decades on.

An Academy Award nominee for best foreign film, it's scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Jan. 22 at the Al Green Theatre (750 Spadina Ave.) at 4 p.m. and again at 7 p.m.

The film, slightly less than two hours in length, unfolds in Hebrew, Ladino and Arabic. It's set in 1947 in pre-state Israel and is essentially an exercise in nostalgia.

The protagonists are Sephardi Jewish immigrants from Alexandria, Egypt. No reason is given why they left. Accustomed to a pampered lifestyle with servants at their beck and call, they now eke out a meagre existence in a poorer neighbourhood of Tel Aviv.

Clara (Gila Almagor), a widow with four children to support, works as a maid to make ends meet. She has seen better days, as her mother, aunt, uncle and sister-in-law can attest.

Sami (Ofer Shalhin), Clara's 15-year-old dutiful son, is the only spark of joy that lights up her otherwise drab life. She has faith in his ability to make something of himself and do her proud.

Nissim (Joseph Shiloach), a randy bachelor who roars around town on a motorcycle, ardently pursues Clara. But she rebuffs his overbearing overtures. "I'm through with love," she says with a note of resignation in her tired voice.

A friend introducers Clara to a suitable suitor, but she is torn by doubts, even as Sami practically begs her to reconsider.

Dropping out of school, Sami finds a job in a workshop, but a strike by disaffected employees upends his dream of easing his mother's financial problems.

Being a typical teenager, Sami tries to relieve his lust with a female acquaintance, but she is not a willing partner.

By chance, he meets Sonia (Michal Bat-Adam), an attractive woman 10 years older than himself. By turns platonic and tender, their relationship is ultimately problematic. Their love-making scenes are beautifully rendered.

Sami's decision to join the Irgun, a right-wing Jewish militia, disappoints Clara, who doesn't quite understand that the country is heading toward war.

The film brims with background tension. Rifle-charging British soldiers raid the homes of suspected Jewish rebels. Bombs explode in the distance. Young Jewish men enlist in the Haganah as the approaching armed struggle over Palestine simmers.

Almagor, a star of the Israeli cinema, delivers a subtle yet powerful performance as a woman under duress.

Shalhin's portrayal as a teen who's mature beyond his years is quite convincing.

Portraying a kibbutznik who has left her husband for a new life in the city, Bat-Adam exudes both demureness and smouldering sexuality.

The House on Chelouche Street takes a viewer back to an era when life in Israel seemed simpler, yet more complex, and when the Jewish state was still an embryonic idea rather than a vital reality.

Gila Almagor, centre, delivers a subtle yet powerful performance in The House on Chelouche Street.

Book illuminates only Frank Lloyd Wright synagogue in the U.S.

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The only synagogue designed by the distinguished American architect Frank Lloyd Wright is in Elkins Park, a suburb north of Philadelphia.

Finished in 1959, Beth Sholom, a Conservative shul designated as a National Historic Landmark in 2007, was one of Wright's last projects.

Considered among his most important works, Beth Sholom is an architectural masterpiece in which the interplay of light, form and space creates an inspiring place of worship.

Today, a model of the synagogue is displayed at the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora on the campus of Tel Aviv University.

The story of its conception and realization is expertly told by Joseph Siry in Beth Sholom Synagogue: Frank Lloyd Wright and Modern Religious Architecture, a lavishly illustrated coffee-table book published by the University of Chicago Press.

Siry, a professor of art history and American studies at Wesleyan University, says that the shul was essentially a joint venture between Wright and its rabbi, Mortimer Cohen.

Rabbi Cohen, having seen and admired a major retrospective of Wright's buildings, approached the famous architect at the end of 1953. They worked so closely together that Wright once referred to Rabbi Cohen as the synagogue's co-designer.

Though they shared the same vision, Wright deferred to Rabbi Cohen on matters of Jewish worship and belief. As Wright's private adviser and guide, the rabbi skillfully steered him through the thickets of Judaism.

To no one's surprise, Wright was a star pupil. Praising the architect's "profound mystical sense of religion," the rabbi said of him, "I found in Mr. Wright a genuinely spiritual person who responded in his unique way to the great teachings of my religion."

To Wright, Beth Sholom was not only a monument to Judaism, but a statement about "the modern potential of architecture," observes Siry.

He adds, "Even today, more than half a century after its dedication, Beth Sholom is a structure without close parallels anywhere. Wright created a work of architecture whose individuality corresponded to the ideal of distinct character that he sought to bestow on his other institutional projects."

Symbolizing American Jews' postwar confidence in the United States as an open and tolerant society, Beth Sholom is a splendid pyramid-like building cast in steel and glass.

Siry, in exemplary fashion, explains and extolls Wright's crowning achievement in this illuminating volume.

Enjoy the charms of Yorkshire

Melody Wren
Special to The CJN

How you imagine England to look from movies and novels – the archetypal England – is what you can expect to see in Yorkshire. Narrow winding roads soaring over steep hills, swooping down again through deep dales, moors sprinkled with sheep, flint walls that curve through grassy knolls for miles, and tiny villages brimming with character – it's all Yorkshire.

Yorkshire is a historic county of Northern England, the largest county in the United Kingdom. Within its borders are areas that are widely considered to be among the greenest in England, due to the vast stretches of open countryside in the Yorkshire Dales and North York Moors, and to the open aspect of some of the major cities

Small village names are fascinating jumbles of never-seen-together letters, as they are a combination of Saxon and Viking names such as "Ugglesbarnby." "By" at the end of the village indicates Viking heritage, and "Kirk" indicates a local church such as "Kirkbymoorside."

Driving through the Yorkshire Moors and Dales is the best way to experience them, with essential stops along the way in the tiniest of villages and larger market towns such as Helmsley. South of the moors is the city of York with its Minster and Tudor architecture in the Shambles. The Shambles is an old street with overhanging timber-framed buildings, some dating back as far as the 14th century.

There are many places that are worth visiting in Yorkshire. Following are a few suggestions.

Fountains Abbey: This is a must-see for anyone going to Yorkshire. The M62 motorway, with the highest elevation in England, took us through the Pennine mountains en route to the abbey. Stunning views into valleys where picture-postcard villages sit invite you to detour and detour we did.

Fountains Abbey – an extraordinary apparition in North Yorkshire – is a masterpiece of 12th century building ingenuity. The dramatic remains of the abbey are the largest monastic ruins in the country. Following the dissolution of the monasteries in 1539 by Henry VIII, the abbey buildings and more than 500 acres of land were sold by the Crown. The land passed through several generations of the Gresham family and finally to Stephen Proctor. He built Fountains Hall and turned the abbey grounds into a beautiful estate that includes a remarkable Georgian water garden.

Set in the naturally beautiful Skell valley, the abbey is flanked by two vast expanses of grass lawns with awe-inspiring cliff faces to either side. The river Skell runs through the valley and under the abbey. This truly is a beautiful place to visit.

Helmsley: The small market town of Helmsley in Ryedale is about half an hour's drive north from York, on the edge of the North York Moors National Park. It is a very pretty town and a magnet for visitors wanting a relaxing country break or to use it as a base for walking or other outdoor activities. You can spend a day wandering through the quaint streets, popping into shops and cafés, and exploring historic buildings. The town offers an eclectic mix of individual boutiques, antique shops and galleries, as well as tearooms, pubs, hotels, butchers and bakers. Helmsley is also a good base for setting off on more energetic pursuits.

White Chalk Horse: A most unusual landmark you can't fail to miss in this part of Yorkshire is a chalk outline of a horse, cut into the side of the hill, just beside the village of Kilburn. The famous White Horse is massive, measuring more than 300 feet long by nearly 300 feet high, and can be seen from miles away. It was the work of John Hodgson, a local schoolmaster who with the help of his pupils completed it in 1857.

Whitby: It's known as a working man's seaside resort town. Even though Whitby is extremely touristy, with many souvenir shops, it's worth a visit. I recommend a morning visit, as it's normally a bit quieter. Ignore the tourist buses and walk to view the harbour and cliff views, then head inland a bit to see village life. For three pounds, take a 30-minute tour on an antique lifeboat, which cruises through the bay. From the boat you see a lovely view of Whitby.

Robin Hood's Bay: A 10-minute drive along the coast takes you to this delightfully unique, hilly seaside village. Considered by many to be the prettiest fishing village on the Yorkshire coast, Robin Hood's Bay clings precariously to steep cliffs, its tiny cottages with their distinctive red tile roofs crowding around the ravine of King's Beck for protection against the fierce winds that blow in from the North Sea. A steep walk down to the sea takes you along a street lined with charming tearooms, cafés and art-gallery shops displaying tasteful, locally made art, and jewelry shops.

Boggle Hole: A bit farther along the coast from Robin Hood's Bay, park your car and walk down to a craggy beach, a youth hostel and Boggle Hole, made famous in A.S. Byatt's book, Possession. A "boggle" is the local name for a hobgoblin, the mischievous "little people" that were thought to live in caves along the coast, as well as the more remote corners of the moors. Boggle Hole was where smugglers used to land with their contraband. A cliff-top path offers superb views of Robin Hood's Bay, which sweeps in a graceful curve. At low tide, bands of soft shale and hard limestone are revealed to enormous effect in the shape of curving ridges. The haunt of geologists and fossil hunters, this rocky shore is a fascinating place to explore, but keep a careful eye on the rising tide.

New releases by Nathan Englander, Cynthia Holz

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

You remember Nathan Englander. He's the former yeshiva bocher turned short-story writer who dazzled the critics about a dozen years ago with For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, a debut collection of stories that inspired raves and comparisons to Babel, Malamud and Singer. Not even his subsequent novel, The Ministry of Special Cases, could elicit such high praise.

Besides his shining, irony-laden prose, what set Englander apart was his deep knowledge of Jewish religious law, lore and literature; he grew up immersed in the haredi world of Crown Heights, Brooklyn, which he masqueraded as "Royal Hills" in his stories.

One story dealt with a Stalinist purge of Yiddishists, another with a Nazi-infested Chelm, several with the ultra-frum world of Royal Hills. Unforgettable characters included the rabbi-cum-charlatan in The Gilgul of Park Avenue and the equally impish rabbi of the title story who writes a rabbinical dispensation allowing a sex-starved husband to visit a prostitute.

As signalled by the publication of the title piece in the New Yorker last month, Englander has a new collection of stories, What We Talk About When We Talk About Anne Frank (Alfred A. Knopf). The title is an allusion to a famous story by Raymond Carver, What We Talk About When We Talk About Love.

The title story, like Carver's, involves two couples socializing over drinks: the American narrator and his wife, Deb, and Deb's old friend, Lauren, and her husband, Mark — who, having become "ultra-Orthodox" and moved to Jerusalem, now call themselves Yerucham and Shoshana.

The foursome grow closer after smoking some pot together, feeling brave enough to explore some uncomfortable truths; the barriers between them seem to just fall away. Englander is at his best here as he explores the various prisms such as religion and culture through which Jews filter their Judaism. He also seems to expose a raw nerve of the Jewish psyche by laying bare a range of deep-seated fears and subliminal thoughts in his characters related to the Holocaust.

As before, Englander extends his range of characters from secular to Orthodox. The settings range from a summer camp in the Berkshires to an outpost beyond Jerusalem.

Everything I Know About My Family on My Mother's Side is a surprisingly good deconstructionalized tale that presents a numbered list of 67 observations about family members, through which character and meaning are slowly and artfully revealed.

In other stories, we see Jews variously seeking out justice, revenge, and their epic national dream. In Camp Sundown, a group of retirees at a Jewish seniors camp dispense their own brand of justice upon an old Nazi, while in How We Avenged the Blums, a group of students wreak revenge upon a bully.

In Sister Hills, a historic tale set on the outskirts of Jerusalem during wartime, Jewish settlers struggle heroically for the good of the nation, to the utter indifference of later generations. My least favourite tale in the bunch is Peep Show, a weird, sexually explicit moral allegory that may be deemed one of Englander's experimental failures. There was at least one such story in the previous collection, too.

Not all of these stories are compelling. But much can be forgiven the author of an iridescent piece like What We Talk About When We Talk About Anne Frank.

Bernard Wasserman and Renata Moon, the central characters in Cynthia Holz's Benevolence (Knopf Canada), are a middle-aged, childless couple straining to regain their former closeness even as they struggle with barriers that separate them from their clients in their professional lives, he as a doctor who assesses patients involved in organ transplants, she as a psychotherapist who helps patients desensitize their phobias and traumas.

The action is minimal in this domestic novel of emotions, and shifts episodically from Bernard to Renata together to each of them in their professional lives, and to Bernard's mother, Molly, a widow who is also striving for emotional closeness in an otherwise cold and sterile world.

Bernard assesses a patient named Arthur who wants to give a kidney to a neighbour: he probes whether Arthur has an ulterior reason for his benevolence. Meanwhile, Renata assists Stella, a woman who has lost her husband in a train wreck and then discovers she is pregnant. Although professional ethics prohibit it, both Bernard and Renata manage to get close to their patients, although they can't seem to get close to each other.

A secret about paternity hovers over these characters and threatens to break open when Molly invites an old male acquaintance, Saul, to rent a room in her home. Saul, and not Molly's deceased husband, is actually Bernard's father. There is no outward moment of revelation, but the seed of truth is definitely planted in Bernard's head.

Holz masterfully integrates the external and inward lives of her characters by showing us what they say and do while revealing their thoughts and adding details of their pasts. In spots, her prose seems as good as anything by Ann Tyler or Anita Brookner, even if the main theme might cause readers to ponder. Holz's previous novels include Semi-Detached and A Good Man, both equally worth reading.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Thornhill sisters are national junior chess champions

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

When Andrew Giblon signed up his young daughters for chess lessons at the local community centre in Thornhill, he had no idea that in just a few short years, both would become national chess champions.

"My cousin had already started playing chess, and my parents thought it'd be nice for us, too – something about wanting the kids out of the house," Rebecca Giblon said with a smile. She's 14 years old and the older of the two girls.

Rebecca began playing chess when she was about six years old and was soon followed by her younger sister, Melissa, now 12. Both girls had a bumpy start, but they were determined to improve.

"I was really not good at all, but I wanted to win," Melissa said of her early days playing.

The sisters practised a lot, undeterred by the steep learning curve of the classic strategy game, until finally, their work began to pay off.

"In Grade 3, something clicked," Rebecca said. "I'm not really sure how it happened."

As they improved, Giblon arranged for private chess coaching for his daughters. In 2007, Rebecca became a national champion for girls under 10. In 2009, she won again for girls under 12, and Melissa won for girls under 10. In 2011, Melissa became national champion for girls under 12.

"It got a lot more fun. Now I actually have something to look forward to," Rebecca said about her success.

Winning the national championships automatically qualified the talented sisters for the World Youth Chess Championships (WYCC). This past November, the girls flew to Brazil with their father, who served as head of the Canadian delegation, and the rest of the Canadian youth chess team to compete at their fourth WYCC. Previously, they had competed at two WYCCs in Turkey and one in Greece.

This year's championship featured some 1,100 competitors from 80 countries. The girls played their matches in a huge hall alongside hundreds of other players, with each match lasting anywhere from two to five hours.

Rebecca finished with the highest score for a Canadian in her section, while Melissa had the second-highest score for a Canadian in her section.

Although both sisters have impressive track records, the world of competitive chess is not exempt from sibling rivalry.

Rebecca said she refuses to play her younger sister because chess is the kind of game in which a worse player can beat a better player given the right scenario.

"If I lose to someone I should've beat, I get upset," she said.

Melissa, on the other hand, said she's open to the challenge of a sibling match. "I decided if Rebecca would be good, I'd be better," she explained matter-of-factly.

Outside of chess, the girls enjoy skiing and reading, and each one was clutching a stack of books they had just borrowed from the library as they arrived for their interview with The CJN.

Rebecca has recently started the gifted program at Thornhill Secondary School, a place where "being a nerd is actually respected," she said.

Melissa, who celebrated her bat mitzvah this past December, is in Grade 7 in the gifted program at Henderson Public School.

For Melissa, the ultimate goal is to earn a place on the Chess Olympiad team, and for Rebecca, it's to earn a title from the World Chess Organization, usually referred to by its French acronym, FIDE.

Currently, Rebecca's FIDE rating is 1720, and Melissa's is 1572. A chess Grandmaster, the highest title a player can earn, needs a minimum rating of 2500. Melissa is hoping to gain 500 rating points over the next six months.

Giblon said he's continually impressed by the dedication his daughters have shown to chess, a game that is often overlooked by young people and is not particularly popular among women.

"I was surprised – it's been a real testament to their skill and their hard work that they've gotten this far," he said.

With their notable titles and the chance to see the world, Giblon is proud of the girls. "Even if they quit chess tomorrow, what they got out of it until now was well worth it," he said.

Hab abruptly traded last week

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

For many years – going back to Mathieu Schneider joining the team in 1987 – the Montreal Canadiens had a couple of Jewish players under contract.

But with the abrupt trade of star player Mike Cammalleri in mid-game Jan. 12, now there are none.

Cammalleri, the Habs' number 13, got a ticket back to the Calgary Flames, where the left-winger had come from in time for the Habs' 2009-10 season, between the second and third periods last Thursday night, when the slumping team lost yet again, this time to the Boston Bruins.

In return, the Canadiens got Flames left winger René Bourque.

Some were linking the trade to comments Cammalleri had made a day earlier about the team's performance so far this season.

In 2009, Cammalleri signed a five-year, $30-million contract with the Habs, but he was having a mediocre season leading up to the trade, scoring only nine times in the 38 games he played in.

According to Maccabi Canada's former president Gary Ulrich, Cammalleri was approached about a year ago by Maccabi officials in Toronto about possible involvement with the organization, but he was noncommittal.

"People in Toronto knew his family," Ulrich told The CJN.

Habs legend Jean Béliveau has been very supportive of Maccabi Canada, travelling twice to Israel with the Canadian team.

A native of Richmond Hill, Ont., Cammalleri, 29, has a Jewish mother and non-Jewish father.

Book reviewer focuses on 'quieter gems' for children

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Heather Feldstein knows how to spot a good book. She looks for a story that is short, sweet, and generally intended for children under 12.

The Toronto-based mother of two is the founder of wordsbymom.com, a website devoted to reviewing children's books.

"There are a lot of really great kids' books out there that are highly marketed, but there are also a number of quieter gems that don't get highlighted very well," she says.

"We all know the classics by Shel Silverstein or the books we grew up with, but what about some of the more recent works?"

Feldstein says that parents often can't browse in bookstores, so they end up buying bestsellers.

"When you go into bookstores, you often have one eye on your kids and you have to judge books by their covers. Or you can ask store clerks, but they usually point to books that are big sellers."

While those books can be really valuable, Feldstein says there is also a lot of great new work that deserves exposure because it speaks to modern children.

An avid reader and a writer, Feldstein regularly attends writers' conferences and reads several new books every week before posting reviews of her favourites.

"Because I'm entrenched in the industry, and this is my full-time job, I hope I can help others find good material."

Feldstein hopes her site is a valuable resource for parents, grandparents and teachers. Though you can't order books directly from wordsbymom.com, the site provides in-depth book reviews and offers suggestions for post-reading discussions.

She reviews books that have a good message, she says.

"The moral doesn't have to be overpowering or preachy. Kids at bedtime generally want lessons delivered in a way that is fun, sweet, or funny."

As an example, Feldstein recommends a book called Ish by Peter H. Reynolds, which is about a little boy who has a passion for drawing.

"It's a really cute book. To children, it's just a funny story at first, until you use it to talk to them about the beauty of encouragement, uniqueness and individuality."

Equally important is a book's pictures.

"The illustrations have to be engaging and bright. As you turn the page, you can see the child's eye as they take in the drawings," she says.

Also, a good children's book will be authentic, she adds.

"The voice of the character has to be genuine, because kids can really pick up on what is real. Kids are raw, and that must be spoken to through literature in order for them to believe it."

She adds that her policy is to read "everything," but only to review books she really loves.

One of her favourite holiday books is Eric Kimmel's The Chanukah Guest, which features a latke maker and a hungry bear.

"I think it celebrates the spirit of Chanukah and the need to invite guests into your home," she says.

Feldstein says that being exposed to good literature can be incredibly beneficial for children.

"The positive experiences we foster when kids are young correlate to early literacy skills," she notes.

She also says that reading to kids can be a bonding experience for families.

"With my own kids, bedtime reading seems to be when they are ready to air their grievances and want to talk about issues or what happened to them at school.

"And at the end of the day, there's something quite magical about snuggling up with a good book," she says. "It's a wonderful opportunity to spend some quality time with your kids."

For Feldstein, children's books can spark conversations about serious issues. She recommends Maxine Trottier's Terry Fox: A Story of Hope, which can be used to talk to kids about cancer, while stressing the importance of hope and recognizing dreams.

"There are certain unfortunate realities in life that we need to talk to our kids about, but we need to expose them in child-friendly ways," she says.

"Another great book is All the Way to America by Dan Yaccarino. It talks about heirlooms, and in our house, we were able to relate that to our own family history with the Holocaust."

Feldstein believes children's books can play a vital role in Holocaust education.

"As that generation dies off, we have some fabulous books that can help us keep their message alive," she says. "It's up to us as parents and grandparents to draw from them."

Feldstein has written a manuscript about her grandparents who survived the Holocaust, which she hopes to someday publish.

Her other book addresses the issue of sibling rivalry.

"With two kids, I can't imagine what inspired that," she joked.

Feldstein notes that it has become increasingly challenging for writers to get published because of competition from e-books and other new forms of literature.

"Traditional publishing houses now only publish the cream of the crop, and the industry is much more competitive [for] a writer," she says.

"From a consumer's perspective though, there's a benefit, because it means there are fewer poor quality books."

Aside from her website, Feldstein also writes regularly for the Huffington Post.

Can't stay silent

Dear Ella,

I'm not sure how much longer I can stay quiet. My daughter is falling apart and I'm standing by watching helplessly.

Sandi and Allen seemed to have a healthy marriage. They both worked hard and had a good mix of independence and togetherness. It appeared to all that they had everything.

Throughout her pregnancy, Allen treated Sandi like a princess. She had a rough few months, and Allen ran around doing whatever she needed. Then Asher was born, and it was like Allen became a different person.

Sandi is up with the baby all night, and she does her best to clean the house, shop for groceries, do laundry, make meals, all while she is breastfeeding and caring for an often-screaming child. Allen comes home, puts his feet up, says he had a stressful day and asks, "What's for dinner?"

I can see the physical and emotional toll this is taking on my daughter. She doesn't complain, but last week she burst into tears and let it all out. Her husband was no longer being a partner. She felt like she was drowning in a sea of chores with no help.

I've always prided myself on not interfering in my children's lives, but I'm worried about Sandi, and I can't stay silent any longer. Any advice would be appreciated.

Time to Meddle

Dear Time to Meddle,

I'm not sure "meddle" is the right word. Perhaps "help" would be a better way to phrase it. Who better to help than someone who is doing it out of love and concern? But you have to be smart.

Sandi is probably exhausted and can't think straight. She is caught up in a circle of chores and doesn't have the time or energy to figure out how to fix this. This is where you come in.

Make a plan. Tell Sandi you want to have a talk with her. Tell her you will come over for the day and babysit with Asher while she sleeps, bathes and regroups. Once she's refreshed, she'll be more open to listen to suggestions.

Tell her your observations and give her some practical solutions. Allen doesn't sound like a bad guy. He's adjusting to a new life and unfamiliar emotions, too, but Sandi has given him the luxury of doing it in his own time.

Here are some suggestions for you to give to your daughter: 1. Get a housekeeper to clean once a week. With two incomes, that should be attainable. In between, learn to live in a messier house. 2. Make meals easier. Have sandwiches, eggs or cereal for dinner. If Allen wants beef stew, he can make it. 3. Give Allen a list of reasonable responsibilities. He can certainly do grocery shopping, take out the trash and take over a feeding or two in the evening. 4. Offer to babysit on occasion so Allen and Sandi can have a couple of hours to themselves. It will do wonders for them, and give them time to talk.

Allen has to realize that Sandi is not sitting home all day watching soap operas. Her job is just as hard as his is. Only she can show him the light. Bringing a new baby into a marriage is a huge adjustment on everyone's part.

ELLA'S "KLOPS" MEATLOAF

(An Old World Recipe with a New World Twist)

2 lbs. ground chicken
2 eggs
1 lg. onion, diced finely
5 garlic cloves, minced
1/2 c + 4 tbsp "Diana's" spicy gourmet BBQ sauce
1/4 c ketchup
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1/2-3/4 c whole wheat bread crumbs
1 tsp. cumin
1/2 tsp. ground pepper
salt to taste
Cooking spray

Preheat oven to 350°. Coat loaf pan with Pam.

Your hands are the best utensils for this recipe.

In a large bowl add all ingredients (except bread crumbs) and 4 tbsps. BBQ sauce. Mix well; mixture will be wet. Add bread crumbs until mixture is moldable but still fairly wet. When all ingredients are incorporated place mixture firmly packed into loaf pan. Using the back of a tablespoon, coat entire top of loaf with remaining BBQ Sauce. Bake 1 hour. Freezes very well.

Artificial nutrition and hydration

A recent seminar organized by a professor of aging and health at the University of Dundee School of Medicine in Scotland was attended by students who are currently enrolled at the school, my alma mater. When I graduated in 1966, it was part of the University of St. Andrews.

It was the morning of my medical class' 45th reunion, and the group of seven students had just finished their educational module on aging and health. I was asked to speak about aging-related issues from the perspective of geriatrics and ethics, as I practise in Toronto.

I stressed the importance of discussing difficult issues with aged patients and their families, especially when illnesses such as late-stage dementia might be the medical problem. There was a consensus that "having the conversation" might be important in helping family members know the values and wishes on which difficult decisions might be based, such as when a loved one might no longer be able to take in adequate food and fluids to maintain nutritional needs.

I play-acted with the students, repeating the kind of conversations I often have in my office with patients and families, as I demonstrated the importance of asking the right kind of questions to help inform them of difficult decisions surrounding the possibility of artificial nutrition and hydration. This is usually provided by a feeding tube, inserted into the stomach and referred to as a PEG (percutaneous endoscopic gastrostomy).

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I chose the eating of ice cream, as I often use that topic during my office conversations. By chance, the day before I had visited a friend from my Dundee university days. She recounted how when her mother was suffering from later-stage dementia, one of the few outings she liked was going out for an ice cream. My friend explained how she would offer her mother the outing, and after some deliberation, it was agreed that they would go and then her mother would deliberate over which flavour to request. Invariably, she ordered rum and raisin. Even though the eating was often messy, the ice cream outing seemed to be one of the woman's last enjoyable experiences. It became apparent to my friend that when ice cream was no longer an enjoyable option, the end would be near and artificial nutrition and hydration would not be a treatment consideration.

During the play-acting with one of the students, I used the typical conversation I have had with many of my patients over the past few years. "So, do you like ice cream?"

"Yes, I love ice cream."

"What is your favourite flavour?"

"Coffee, or sometimes strawberry."

"How would you feel if you could never taste ice cream again – in fact, if you couldn't taste anything ever again and everything that went into you went in through a tube into your stomach?"

At this point in the conversation, which I have had many times with patients in the presence of family members, the person will often look at me, and say, "Are you crazy? Who would want that?"

I then turn to the family and say, "This is just the beginning of the 'conversation,' but it is important that you remember it, because often in a situation of crises, you may feel compelled to agree to a PEG, forgetting what you heard here. I recommend that you have other conversations like this to help you decide how you will respond when the time comes."

It was a nation of ambivalent Israelis that listened to U.S. President Barack Obama's latest Middle East plan – an interim agreement based on ending the occupation of the Palestinians while somehow ensuring the security of the Israelis.

Israeli ambivalence is peculiar. It has nothing to do with uncertainty or confusion. Instead, to be an ambivalent Israeli is to be torn between two conflicting certainties. An ambivalent Israeli believes that a Palestinian state is an existential necessity – and that

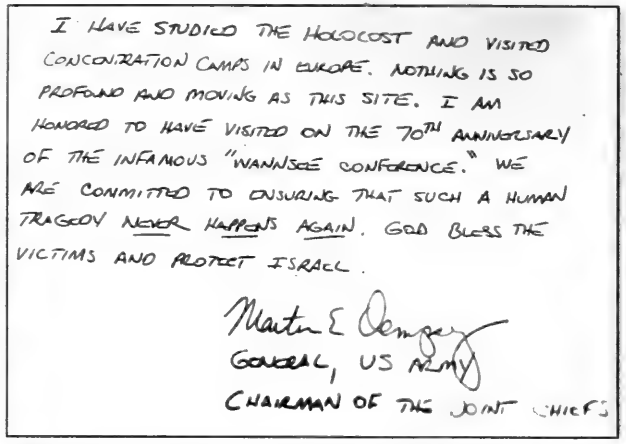
America's promise: 'Never again'



I HAVE STUDIED THE HOLOCOST AND VISITED CONCENTRATION CAMPS IN EUROPE. NOTHING IS SO PROFOUND AND MOVING AS THIS SITE. I AM HONORED TO HAVE VISITED ON THE 70TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INFAMOUS "WANNSEE CONFERENCE." WE ARE COMMITTED TO ENSURING THAT SUCH A HUMAN TRAGEDY NEVER HAPPENS AGAIN. GOD BLESS THE VICTIMS AND PROTECT ISRAEL.
Martin E Dempsey
GENERAL, US ARMY
CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS

During his trip to Israel last week, Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial on the 70th anniversary of the infamous Wannsee Conference, at which the Nazis planned the "Final Solution" for the Jews. Dempsey was moved to write a note in which he committed to preventing such an atrocity in the future. [Israel Sun and Flash90 photos]

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United States have a shared understanding of security concerns in the Middle East, the chairman of U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Martin Dempsey, said last week during his first visit to Israel.

Dempsey's trip came as the United States has been trying to co-ordinate steps and clarify Israel's intentions regarding a possible attack on Iran's nuclear installations.

But in a statement released at the end of his visit – he arrived Thursday and left Friday afternoon before Shabbat – Dempsey did not include any direct references to the U.S. or Israeli positions on Iran.

In Israel, Dempsey met with President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Gen. Benny Gantz.

"We have many interests in common in the region in this very dynamic time, and the more we can continue to engage each other, the better off we'll all be," Dempsey told reporters after meeting with Barak.

He stressed that his main contacts during the visit were with Gantz. They discussed "relations between the two militaries, the Americans' new military strategy, as well as budgets and the economy," Dempsey said.

He also referred to the postponement of joint military exercises between Israel and the United States that were scheduled for April, but were believed to have been rescheduled to reflect U.S. President Barack Obama's desire to defuse tension with Iran. Demspey said the delay will lead to "better training results."

He also visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem on the 70th anniversary of the Wannsee Conference, during which the Nazis worked out the details of their "Final Solution."

Dempsey said that in the Yad Vashem guest book, he expressed U.S. commitment to preventing a future Holocaust.

Peres said the issue of Iran and its quest for nuclear weapons is not one of concern exclusively to the United States or Israel, but rather to the entire international community.

Writer Unrepentant

VANCOUVER — The author of a column in a leading Indo-Canadian newspaper that called Zionism a "cancer" defended his views in a followup article. Jewish groups criticized the original piece, published Jan. 7 in the Vancouver-based South Asian Link, as antisemitic, but Sawraj Singh, an Ellensburg, Wash.-based surgeon and chair of the Washington State Network for Human Rights and the Central Washington Coalition for Social Justice, said some critics "deliberately tried to confuse the word Zionism with Judaism" and denied the article was antisemitic. "Zionism is a political movement which many people, including some Jews, oppose," he wrote Jan. 15 in the Link. Citing the 1975 UN General Assembly resolution, Singh, a longtime Link contributor, charged that "Zionism is a system that fosters apartheid and racism," and that's why he opposes it. In a response to the controversy, Link editor Paul Dhillon wrote Jan. 15 that his paper supports Israel's right to exist, but he also distinguished between Judaism and Zionism, adding that "if Dr. Singh's article was perceived to be hateful or anti-Jewish – we apologize on Dr. Singh's behalf for any hurt or wrong it may have caused. We have also urged Dr. Singh to be cautious when it comes to using the Jewish community in the context of his arguments."

More U.S. Jews?

NEW YORK — More than six million Jews live in the United States, according to two new studies. The studies, using different methodologies, found between 6.4 million and 6.6 million U.S. Jews – about 1.8 per cent of the population, the Forward reported. That's some 20 per cent higher than the 5.2 million reported by the 2000 National Jewish Population Survey, sponsored by the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA), which was said to have undercounted the Jewish population. A study by Ira Sheskin, a University of Miami geographer, and Arnold Dashefsky, a sociologist at the University of Connecticut (UC), for UC's North American Jewish Data Bank put the correct figure at 6,588,000, while a study by Brandeis University sociologist Leonard Saxe put the number at 6.4 million. The studies are important because the once-a-decade JFNA survey wasn't conducted this year after JFNA declined to underwrite it.

Police Release Photos in Mosque Attack

OTTAWA — Police in Gatineau, Que., released security camera photos and video footage last week of a suspect they believe spray-painted a Star of David and hate slogans on a local mosque earlier this month

The incident, which occurred overnight on Jan. 5 was the fourth in six months and the second that week at the Outaouais Islamic Centre. Police believe the attack was perpetrated by a lone man in his early 20s who was caught on camera scrawling anti-Arab slurs on the centre's front doors, its side and on two other entrances.

Security photo

On Jan. 2, the windows of cars parked in front of the same centre were smashed.

The Jan. 5 security pictures show a 5-8, 175-pound man wearing a black coat over a grey hooded sweatshirt, and he wore black shoes, police said.

Police are treating the attack as a hate crime and urging anyone with information to contact them.

Rabbi Suspended

NEW YORK — The chief rabbi of Amsterdam has been suspended for signing a statement on curing homosexuality. Rabbi Aryeh Ralbag of New York, who travels to the Netherlands twice yearly to rule on halachic matters, signed a declaration that "therapy and tshuvah" can overcome homosexuality. He'll remain suspended until he discusses the issue in person with local Jewish leaders, who said gays are "full members" of the community.

Key Conservative ministers head to Israel

Reception will celebrate friendship between countries

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Two high-ranking Canadian cabinet ministers are scheduled to visit Israel after attending the World Economic Forum's annual meeting this week.

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and Finance Minister James Flaherty will both travel to Jerusalem in time for a dinner reception co-hosted by the Canadian Embassy and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' (CIJA) Israel bureau.

The Feb. 1 reception will celebrate the longstanding friendship between the two countries.

Baird and Flaherty are also scheduled to hold meetings with their Israeli counterparts, Avigdor Lieberman, minister of foreign affairs, and Yuval Steinitz, minister of finance, during their roughly week-long trip.

John Baird

James Flaherty

A spokesperson for Baird's office confirmed the ministers would be travelling to Israel immediately after their meetings in Davos, although he could not comment on a specific itinerary. The World Economic Forum's event runs from Jan. 25 to Jan. 29.

CIJA said it will host the Canadian delegation at the gala dinner in conjunction with the Canadian Embassy and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation. Other Canadian delegates scheduled to take part in the trip include numerous CIJA board members and Mario Silva, the former Liberal MP for Davenport who was recently nominated to chair the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research in 2013.

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, told The CJN his organization was "delighted" the ministers are going to Israel.

"We think it's a reflection of the level of qualitative collaboration and consultation between the two countries on so many different levels and across the spectrum of files," he said. "There is a deep alliance that has emerged between the countries."

Israel's urgent priority

From the editor's desk...

CN columnist Jean Gerber this week eloquently pours out her heart and a deeply felt bit of her wrath on the subject of the recent unsightly efforts by some extremist haredim in Israel to segregate women away from men in the public domain of Israeli life.

She writes, of course, as an aggrieved Jewish woman. But more poignantly, she writes, simply, as an aggrieved Jew who is worried for the future of Israel, the "wonderful, flawed state" that means so very much to her.

"Israeli society has dangerous rifts that, unaddressed, will be more dangerous than 10 Arab armies," Gerber writes, referring to the hardscrabble resentments and distrusts among and within the various religious groupings to their non-religious fellow countrymen and women.

Gerber aptly described the bullying of eight-year-old Na'ama Margolese and the subsequent aggressive protests last month in Beit Shemesh as "a public display of choleric fundamentalism."

And she was absolutely correct.

The rowdy, crude, boorish behaviour we witnessed directed at Na'ama and her mother was shocking, an affront to our sensibilities as human beings, let alone as Jews. And we were ever more puzzled and wounded and angered because the justification for the behaviour was said to emanate from the teachings of the holy texts.

Last week, in an op-ed essay in the Globe and Mail, the eminent Israeli commentator, writer, scholar Yossi Klein Halevi also condemned the extremist haredi behaviour.

But he explained the recent boldness of the violent behaviour in terms that were new, not often, if indeed noted at all by social and political writers.

"The haredi community is hardly monolithic and is divided by its attitudes toward the secular state. It is, in part, the growing involvement of some haredim in mainstream Israeli society that has led to an extremist backlash among others. This new wave of fanaticism isn't a sign of self-confidence but of desperation." (My emphasis)

Klein Halevi points out that the integrative steps that increasing, though still small, numbers of haredim have taken to find employment, to serve in the army, to join in the national public discourse are worrying some of the even more cloistered and insular haredim. And thus, the latter, such as the sect in Beit Shemesh, lash out with greater "religiously based" ferocity.

In an essay titled Gender Troubles on the website Jewish Ideas Daily, Yehudah Mirsky makes much the same point.

"But the mounting violence against women, no doubt reflecting sincere conviction... also seems to bespeak increasing internal tensions.

"Though traditionalist, they have internalized modern aspirations to remake society and strategies of ideological mobilization. Far from monolithic, they have their own internal kulturkampfen. Haredi singers perform before mixed audiences. Haredim serve in special military units – and often face community ostracism. Haredi women have made extraordinary educational and occupational strides. The response by some has been to send them, literally, to the back of the bus – and push them out of view elsewhere."

The harsh and ugly images we have seen of late involving the haredi violence in Beit Shemesh and Mea Shearim do indeed depict a certain truth of haredi attempts to manipulate public life to suit their own narrow mysogynist purposes. But as Klein Halevi and Mirsky – both astute and knowledgeable observers of Israeli life – suggest, the violence also depicts a certain turbulence stirring within the variegated stripes of haredi life.

Notwithstanding the sociological roots of the haredi violence, Klein Halevi, Mirsky and Gerber also point out that the key cornerstone of any ultimate response to the violence must be political.

"Israel's dysfunctional coalition system," as Klein Halevi describes it, must be permanently reformed.

"The real threat to Israeli society comes not from the acts of haredi extremists but from the distorted relationship of the haredi community to the state. Haredim not only exclude themselves from the responsibilities of Israeli citizenship but demand that the mainstream subsidize their separatism."

Klein Halevi concludes as so many others concerned for Israel have concluded: "The large major political parties [must] join together to change the current coalition system, which allows minority parties to force their will on the majority."

As urgent a place as the Iranian threat, the rise of Arab Islamism in the Middle East or the moribund peace process with the Palestinians occupy on the national agenda of the State of Israel, so, too, should the subject of electoral reform.

If the State of Israel is to be eternally for the citizens of Israel and for the people of Israel, the government of Israel must set to this task as a matter of the highest national priority.

Ministers to meet with Israeli counterparts

Fogel said his organization had issued invitations to both Lieberman and Steinitz to attend the reception for the Canadian ministers, but as of the weekend, neither had confirmed their attendance. However, he expressed certainty that both Baird and Flaherty would meet with their counterparts and participate in a series of bilateral discussions that would also "extend beyond their direct counterparts as well."

"I understand that there will be time spent with both Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres as well," he added.

According to Fogel, most of the trip will be spent travelling within Israel, with Baird scheduled to make stops at Yad Vashem and present a keynote speech at the annual Herzliyah Conference and Flaherty scheduled to meet with members of Israel's financial community.

'Chinese Schindler' to be honoured by MPs

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Three Toronto MPs will come together Thursday night to honour a man some refer to as the Chinese Oskar Schindler.

The late Feng Shan Ho, a Chinese diplomat who helped thousands of Jews escape Nazi-occupied Austria by granting them immigration visas from 1938 to 1940, will be honoured by York Centre MP Mark Adler, Willowdale MP Chungsen Leung and Etobicoke-Centre MP Ted Opitz at the Hillcrest Library on Jan. 26 at 6:30 p.m.

Speaking from her home in San Francisco, Ho's daughter, Manli Ho, said she is very proud that her father is being honoured and that people are beginning to learn about his life-saving actions.

She said it wasn't until her father died in 1997 at the age of 96 that she learned about how he helped Jews escape Austria.

Feng Shan Ho
[Ho Family Collection]

Manli said she has since spent more than a decade researching her father's past and is working on a book.

She said her father had been very vague about his years as the Chinese consul general in Vienna, but in the weeks following his death, she began to do some research and discovered that he issued immigration visas to Jews who were desperate to escape Vienna after Nazi Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938.

"When I started, [his story] really was virtually unknown. No one had heard about my father," she said.

Few countries were willing to open their doors to Jews, but Ho, who had a "liberal policy," authorized visas to anyone who asked.

Word quickly spread among the Jewish population that the Chinese consulate was granting papers. In the months before the outbreak of war, Ho issued thousands of visas, averaging 500 a month.

Manli said that, interestingly, in 1937, after Japan invaded China, visas to Shanghai issued by Chinese diplomats were virtually worthless. She explained that Shanghai's harbour had no passport control, meaning anyone could cross the border into China unchecked.

But the visas weren't necessarily tickets into Shanghai. Rather, they were tickets out of Vienna.

She said issuing end-destination visas to Shanghai was a ploy to provide Jewish refugees with the proof of emigration required by Nazi authorities to leave Austria.

"I have one quote from [his memoirs] that said, 'Visas to Shanghai were in name only. It was really a means to facilitate people to get out of Austria.'"

The visas even helped Jews who were imprisoned in Dachau and Buchenwald concentration camps prior to the war.

"If your father, brother or uncle had been arrested... and deported to Dachau or Buchenwald, if you went to the Gestapo and said, 'Look, look, look – I have a visa, I have proof that he can emigrate somewhere,' they let him go," she said.

As many as 18,000 Jews reached Shanghai, and thousands more used their visas to reach other destinations, including Palestine, the Philippines and Cuba.

Manli said that when she began researching her father's past, "I started looking for people... who had gotten these visas."

The first survivor she tracked down who had kept a visa that her father had issued was Toronto resident Eric Goldstaub.

"As a result of my finding survivors like Eric Goldstaub and his cousin, Harry, who was born in Shanghai... people like them wrote into Yad Vashem and Yad Vashem investigated, and three years after my father's death, they designated my father as Righteous Among the Nations [in 2000]."

Adler, who will be speaking at Thursday's event from the perspective as a son of a Holocaust survivor, praised Ho as an example of one of the countless "unsung heroes" who helped Jews survive.

"There are a lot of unsung heroes that did a lot of good work at the time and rescued a lot of lives, and I think there are probably dozens and dozens more that we don't know about and probably will never know about," Adler said.

Goldstaub, a 90-year-old Willowdale resident who was issued 20 visas for himself and his family members by Ho in 1938, plans to attend the event.

In November, Goldstaub told the National Post that he owes his life to Ho.

"If I never knocked on that door in Vienna, I would have been in a concentration camp," he said. "And I would have died, I am almost sure of that. Our whole family would have died. We needed Feng Shan Ho. He saved us. It was a miracle."

Technion's contribution to Israeli economy lauded

Dinner honours new Generation Next project

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Technion professor emeritus Shlomo Maital was in Toronto last week to share inspirational success stories about Israel's technology institute.

The Canadian Technion Society (CTS), which raises funds and awareness for Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, organized a dinner in honour of the new Generation Next project, an initiative to attract the 25-to-45 crowd to become involved with the organization.

The event, held at Dr. Laffa restaurant in North York and led by CTS national development director Hershel Recht, Generation Next chair Jack Bensimon, and CTS president Eddie Pal, brought together about 25 young professionals who represent the future of the organization.

Shlomo Maital

Technion's Maital, an author, researcher and educator who also taught at Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) for 20 years, began his lecture by referencing a study that documented MIT's contribution to the U.S. economy.

"It showed that 26,000 businesses were started by MIT grads and if you put their GDP, their product, their value together, it would be an economy that would be the 11th largest in the world. I wondered about the Technion," said Maital, who has served in Israel's economic ministry and is about to release a book he co-authored with Technion professor Amnon Frenkel called Technion Nation: Technion's Contribution to Israel and to Humanity.

He said that it cost about $1 billion to educate the 2010 undergraduate class, but their contribution to Israel's economy is expected to be an estimated $1.76 billion to nearly $3 billion a year.

However, Maital stressed, the success of Technion graduates shouldn't be documented using statistics, facts and figures alone.

The book, scheduled for release in June, will also present stories about the contributions Technion graduates have made to Israeli society and the rest of the world.

Maital referred to 2004 Nobel Prize winners and Technion professors Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover, who, along with American scientist Irwin Rose, discovered ubiquitin, a protein that causes cells to turn off and die.

"Everyone in biology was studying how cells live and divide. Hershko thought it would be great to study how cells died," Maital said.

"Everyone told him, 'That's a graveyard for your career. Nobody cares how and why cells die.' It turns out when cells don't die, they become something called cancer."

Maital said that based on these findings, a pharmaceutical company developed a drug that kills cells before they can develop into cancer cells.

Maital added that one of Hershko's friends has benefited from his scientific work. When his friend was diagnosed with stage-three myeloma – a bone marrow cancer that gave him about five years to live – the drug that was produced based on Hershko's discovery worked to slow down the development of the cancer, adding years to his life.

Another inspirational story Maital shared highlighted the work of Technion electrical engineering graduate Amit Goffer, who was involved in an accident that left him unable to walk and confined to a wheelchair.

Instead of being resigned to his fate as a quadriplegic, "He asked, 'How can you take people who cannot move their legs and put them on their feet and enable them to walk?' That's a question with a lot of chutzpah, even to ask the question," Maital said.

Goffer designed a prototype he called an exoskeleton, a mechanical device that a person wears on his legs.

"When a person leans forward, the computer senses that and moves the leg, and then the other leg."

The technology is called ReWalk, and it enables people with lower-limb disabilities to stand, walk, and even climb stairs.

"The device is being used now in veterans hospitals in the U.S. to help soldiers who've been wounded and crippled by war to walk. And you can imagine what that feels like for a 21-year-old ex-marine who is in a wheelchair, to be able to stand up and walk," he said.

Maital, who said he was asked to keep his talk brief, stopped himself from sharing many more awe-inspiring stories that showcase Technion's positive contribution to the world. But he encouraged the gathering to learn more about the technology institute and help the next generation of Technion students turn their ideas into something tangible.

"The thing about the Technion... is that the scientists who have made these discoveries, mostly are not satisfied with writing academic papers. They like to... implement their ideas."

Hillel starts new group for gay students

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto has launched a new group to help gay Jewish students and young professionals bridge their cultural and sexual identities.

LGBTQ Jews, which represents lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, and queer young Jews, was founded to address a need expressed by Toronto-area students, said Sara Cuneo, Hillel of Greater Toronto's engagement co-ordinator.

"We recognized that among our student base there are LGBTQ Jewish students who wanted to see out of Hillel some sort of program or service that would be catered towards that population," she said.

Until recently, Hillel partially funded Kulanu Toronto, a social group for Jewish LGBTQ people of all ages.

Cuneo said Hillel saw a need to start another group that catered specifically to students and young professionals.

"The people who come out to Kulanu events tend to be of an older demographic, so there was an expressed need from Hillel students and young professionals that they wanted something that targeted their [age group]," she said.

"Kulanu for us really stands as a model for what LGBTQ programming can look like. We're also interested in providing social and cultural programs to students and young professionals and they've really done a lot of groundbreaking work in the community," Cuneo said, adding that Kulanu's executive director Justine Apple helped put her in touch with students and youths who would be interested in the new group.

On Jan. 19, LGBTQ Jews held its kick-off event, a meet-and-greet held at the Wolfond Centre for Campus Jewish Life, which later moved to a local University of Toronto pub called the Red Room.

"The response we've gotten has just been incredible. People are coming out of the woodwork and saying, 'Thank you, we really wanted to see this happen,'" Cuneo said.

Ryan Kraft, a 28-year-old at George Brown College studying to be a sign language interepreter, said he's thrilled about joining the new Hillel initiative.

"We're all really excited about it. This is an important community group and we're thrilled that this is coming together," said Kraft, who came out to his family when he was a 15-year-old student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Kraft said he's encouraged that people seem to be more accepting and aware of people's sexual identities.

"It is a different world from when I came out 13 years ago," he said. "There are a lot more resources now than there were when I was younger, and I think taking advantage of those resources is really important.

"Groups like [Tanenbaum] CHAT's new gay-straight alliance is an excellent, excellent initiative, and I think LGBTQ Jews is an excellent initiative."

Cuneo said she hopes to network and co-ordinate with other like-minded campus groups including U of T's LGBTOUT, which might have Jewish members who could be interested in Hillel's programing.

Kraft added that in addition to social events, LGBTQ Jews also plans to hold educational programs, including bringing in representatives from Aguda, the Israeli LBGT advocacy organization, to do a presentation.

Cuneo said this group offers people the opportunity "to explore the intersection of religious and sexual identities.

"I think it is important to let students who identify as LGBTQ to know that it is possible to bridge the two identities and that they don't have to be at odds with one another."

The world shifts

Seldom has there been as succinct an assessment of the Iranian regime's statements about the peaceful purposes of its nuclear program than that made by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to the CBC last week.

"There is absolutely no doubt they are lying," the prime minister said.

Iran's scheme to develop nuclear weapons "is just beyond dispute at this point," he added. "The only dispute is how far advanced it is and how far off it will be until they actually develop those weapons and develop the capability of delivering the weapons."

As Harper also suggested in the interview, a majority of world leaders have arrived at the same conclusion. Of late some of these leaders seem to be shifting their policies on Tehran to reflect their growing concerns and worries.

For example, as reported in the London Telegraph, after a visit to the Gulf States last week, itself an unsubtle act of diplomatic message-sending undoubtedly not lost on the Iranian regime, Chinese premier Wen Jiabao said that "China adamantly opposes Iran developing and possessing nuclear weapons."

Far more pointedly, China has also decided to speak to Iran in a language that cuts far deeper than a strong political statement about nuclear weapons. The Washington Post recently reported that China reduced its January oil imports from Iran from a daily average of around 550,000 barrels to 285,000 barrels a day.

The United States has already implemented a newer level of banking system sanctions against the Iranian regime that have reportedly started to severely affect the Iranian economy. And the European Union is also currently considering implementing wide sanctions against Iran and cuts in Iranian oil imports. Frustrated and feeling the economic strain, the Iranians have lashed out, threatened to close the Strait of Hormuz, put on more demonstrations of military swagger and once again boasted of their progress in the enrichment of their uranium.

Against this turbulent international scenario, the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Martin Dempsey, visited Israel last weekend to meet with the Israeli political and military leadership.

At the end of his visit all Dempsey would say about his purpose in Israel was to "advance a shared understanding of the security situation in the region."

Iran was clearly the subject of discussion. Israel and the United States are taking all necessary steps to ensure the lines of communication and co-ordination between them are constantly engaged.

In his CBC interview, Harper said he was frightened by the government in Tehran. "I've watched and listened to what the leadership in the Iranian regime says, and it frightens me."

We should all be frightened. Apparently most of the world is.

Not easy to establish a museum

In the article "Cash shortfall delays human rights museum" (Jan. 5), you note that the private sector's fundraising goal for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights was $150 million. When the federal government first expressed interest in making the museum a Crown corporation, it entered into an agreement in 2007 with the various stakeholders, including the Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights. The Friends agreed to raise $105 million toward the construction and development costs. The commitment of the Friends was to deliver a cheque for $105 million by April 1, 2011. This is what the Friends did, so in fact, we met our goal of raising $105 million. Recently, when costs increased to $310 million, the museum asked the Friends to increase their goal from $105 million to $150 million. We have been steadily working on raising this amount and have raised an additional $25 million over our original goal, which in and of itself was viewed as quite ambitious.

We will continue to seek support from the private sector so that this federal Crown corporation can open as soon as possible. Happily, our donors continue to show unwavering support and are rising to the challenge. As we have said to our supporters, no one said this would be easy, and it probably explains why this is the only new national museum established in more than 45 years. While it is definitely not for the faint of heart, the good that this museum can do definitely makes it worth the effort.

Pfefferkorn's Holocaust memoir (1)

Eli Pfefferkorn's powerful new Holocaust memoir, The Muselmann at the Water Cooler, tells the story of a life impacted by the Holocaust, a worldview shaped by its trauma, beyond detailing the horrors that have been painfully shared by others ("Memoir as literature," Dec. 22). Reading it, I often felt that he concealed the terrible details of his experience, even as he openly shared his reflections on them and their relationship to our lives.

Some years ago, students at Or Chaim-Ulpanat Orot visited public and Catholic schools in Toronto and presented on the Holocaust. I asked Pfefferkorn to help guide us in creating the curriculum. Looking back, I see that the same themes that animate his writings were the very notions he encouraged the students to think about and confront – and which you raise in your column – as they thought about presenting to a non-Jewish audience. This vision added to the power and impact this program had.

You are to be commended for your extremely positive review of Eli Pfefferkorn's book The Muselmann at the Watercooler ("Memoir as literature," Dec. 22). However, at the end of your review, you left readers with the impression that the book is "hard reading." Yes, the Holocaust is a difficult subject, but how can such a riveting account, one that draws in the reader from the very first page, be "hard reading"? After having read Pfefferkorn's book, I would agree only insofar as it is a hard book to put down.

Misplaced nostalgia for BJCC

Although the new JCC will not be opening until 2016, it's important to remember that the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto waited until a new, contemporary exercise facility was built before the old Bathurst Jewish Community Centre was demolished. It is currently operating on the same site ("Federation says new JCC to open in 2016," Jan. 5). The article seems to make light of the fact that this facility is already operating at 80 per cent capacity. There seems to be a lot of misplaced nostalgia about the BJCC. The truth is that when I was using the facility as a member on numerous occasions, we never knew the temperature of the shower to expect, and we were often appalled by the rundown nature of the building. What is now available is a vast improvement over what was.

The Iranian nuclear threat to Israel

What are the remaining options?

Louis René Beres

On Jan. 16, 2003, Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon was advised by a security policy group about the threat of Iranian nuclear weapons.

This report by the Daniel Project Group, which contained substantial legal and strategic recommendations, urged the prime minister to suitably enhance Israel's deterrence and defence postures; to consider a prompt end to deliberate nuclear ambiguity (if Iran should be permitted to become nuclear), and to appropriately refine pertinent pre-emption options. It also concluded that Israel should not expect stable coexistence with a nuclear Iran and that active national defence should be increased and strengthened accordingly.

Israel's active defence strategy involves mutually reinforcing the Arrow, Iron Dome and, in the future, Magic Wand missile systems. To adequately protect against a potential attack of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) from Iran, however, these advanced elements of ballistic missile defence are not enough. They must be complemented by improved Israeli nuclear deterrence and by a capacity for viable conventional first strikes against selected Iranian military and industrial targets. Under no circumstances, advised Project Daniel, should Israel assume that a safe and durable "balance of terror" could ever be created with Tehran.

Generally, in strategic thinking, deterrence logic must be based on an assumption of enemy rationality. This assumption might not always be warranted in the case of Iran. Any purported analogy between Iran and the United States deterrence relationship with the former Soviet Union would be facile or simply misguided.

If Iran's current leadership could somehow meet the core test of rationality, always valuing national survival over other preferences or combination of preferences, there could still remain intolerable security risks to Israel. In part, these risks would be associated with Tehran's expectedly problematic command and control of any future nuclear capabilities. For example, even a determinedly rational Iranian leadership could base critical nuclear decisions upon erroneous information, assorted computer errors, or fragile pre-delegations of launch authority.

The related vulnerability of command and control to violent regime overthrow in Tehran must also be taken into close account by decision makers in Jerusalem. Ironically, there can be no assurances that any new or "improved" regime in Iran would necessarily pose a diminished security threat to Israel.

If Israel's active defence systems were accurately presumed 100 per cent effective, even an irrational Iranian adversary armed with nuclear or biological weapons could be kept at bay without defensive first strikes or any threats of retaliation. But no ballistic missile defence system can ever be "leak proof."

Terrorist proxies in ships or trucks, not missiles, could deliver Iranian nuclear attacks upon Israel. In such low-tech but distinctly high-consequence assaults, there would be no security benefit to Israel from its deployed anti-missile defences.

Israel can never depend entirely upon its anti-ballistic missiles to defend against future WMD attacks from Iran any more than it can rely entirely on nuclear deterrence. This does not mean that active defence is a less than vital part of Israel's larger security apparatus. It is vital, but it is not sufficient.

Israeli Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Benny Gantz, right, and U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Army Gen. Martin Dempsey, salute during a welcoming ceremony in a military base in Tel Aviv, last Friday. Dempsey began an intense string of closed talks with Israeli leaders, amid apparent disagreements between the two countries over how to handle Iran's nuclear program. [Gideon Markowicz/FLASH90 photo]

Every state has a right under international law to act pre-emptively when facing potentially existential aggression. The 1996 Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice even extends such lawful authority to the pre-emptive use of nuclear weapons in certain residual or last-resort circumstances. For now, however, any purposeful Israeli resort to "anticipatory self-defence" would surely be non-nuclear.

Nonetheless, it is quite likely that the operational window for any such cost-effective conventional tactic has already closed and that Israel would decline any remaining nuclear pre-emption option, albeit lawful. For now, it seems that any Israeli "pre-emption" would necessarily be far more limited, perhaps involving the targeted killing of selected enemy scientists or military figures and substantially expanded cyber-warfare.

If Iran should be allowed to become nuclear, in plain contravention of its Non-Proliferation Treaty obligations, Israel would immediately need to enhance the credibility of its (presumed) nuclear deterrent. This robust second-strike strategic force, hardened, multiplied, and dispersed, would have to be fashioned, observably, to inflict a decisive retaliatory blow against selected enemy cities. In military terms, this means for Israel a more openly counter value-targeted nuclear force.

Significantly, the dangers of a nuclear Iran could directly impact the United States. While it might still be several years before any Iranian missiles could strike American territory, the United States could still become as vulnerable as Israel to certain nuclear-armed terrorist surrogates. In this connection, any American plan for a "rogue state" anti-ballistic missile shield, for us and our NATO allies, would have precisely the same limited protection benefits as Israel's already-deployed active defence systems.

As long as Iran proudly announces its literally genocidal intentions toward Israel, while simultaneously and illegally developing nuclear weapons and infrastructures, Jerusalem has no reasonable choice but to protect itself with the best means available.

Under long-standing international law, every government's most basic and incontestable obligation is the assurance of protection to its citizens.

Louis René Beres is a professor of international law at Purdue University. This essay was published as a Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies Perspectives paper.

Societal rifts threaten Israeli democracy

Deep divisions inherent in the civil society of Israel have finally come into the public eye. With the repulsive attack on an eight-year-old girl in Beit Shemesh, haredim made a statement about their intent. This most recent event has been accompanied by a public display of choleric fundamentalism demonstrated by repeated haredi attempts to segregate women in public areas.

The outrage in Beit Shemesh would have gone unnoticed had it not been so egregious: a religious child on her way to a dati school was verbally abused by the self-named sicarii (more about that later) for not being modestly dressed. Who knew that there was a salafist sect within Judaism? The frightening skirmish over a child made headlines, revealing what we should have known a long time ago: Israeli society has dangerous rifts that, unaddressed, will be more dangerous than 10 Arab armies.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

The destruction of the Second Temple was accompanied by vicious internal bloodshed, with Jew fighting Jew. Hence the rabbis' dictum that hatred between Jew and Jew caused its downfall. The sicarii were the anti-Roman uprising's most infamous fighters, stabbing any Jew they decided was a traitor to their cause. Their weapon of choice, the blade, gained them the name. That some haredim have adopted this sobriquet is beyond frightening, until we realize that the schools to which these people go have taught them no Jewish history whatsoever. Or is that even more alarming?

Now readers of our dailies and listeners to CBC know that in parts of Israel women are segregated to the back of the bus. Those of us old enough to recall that epithet shudder at the overtones. "Women to the back!" can be easily heard as "Blacks to the back," and we all know where that ended.

While some may claim that the women doing this are "secular," making a provocation, no one can argue that Yocheved Horowitz is anything but a God-fearing and educated haredi woman. A member of the Gurer Hasidim, she, too, has been yelled at and denigrated within her community for rightly pointing out the wrong-headedness of this bus tommyrot.

My own dati friends in Israel tell me that such verbal (and sometimes more physical) attacks are not uncommon, and becoming more common. Sometimes it appears that the perpetrators want to empty a neighbourhood for their own followers to occupy. Could this be the case in Beit Shemesh?

More distressingly, they also retain their grip on political power and the amazing amounts of money that flow into their systems from a government cravenly beholden to them in the Knesset.

These incidents, and so many more that we may never hear about, point to a darker reality.

A system of separate and unregulated schools for sectarian communities – seemingly designed to accommodate a few at the inception of the state – now threatens to overwhelm not just the political life of the country, but its most cherished values of democracy, freedom from religious persecution (in this instance being perpetrated by the haredim and some chassidic sects), and equality for men and women in all walks of life.

A few dozen Israeli women participated in a flash-mob dance event on Ben Yehuda Street in the centre of Jerusalem last week. The flash mob was organized in response to the demand by some religious bodies to exclude women from public life in Israeli society. [Flash90 photo]

The separation of state and synagogue has been eroded by years of bowing to demands by sectarian political parties for a place at the governing table, enabled by Israel's bizarre voting system. It has been weakened considerably by the growth of schools that teach not the values of a democracy, but the demands of a narrow theocracy. Both the political and cultural stresses on civil society have been exposed by these latest happenings.

Some haredim claim that, once things die down, they can deal with the extremists internally. A few others, such as Yocheved, have gone public and suffered for it, among the threats being that no one will marry their children.

How to begin to address these issues?

Public services need to stand firm against attempts to make them into private apartheid places. Politicians need to overcome their addiction to haredi and extremist parties. No less importantly – indeed crucially – the education system in Israel must be reconfigured.

Those within the haredi community who know that change has to come from within need to open their schools and minds to see that they are a part of a wonderful, flawed state, along with every other citizen of Israel. As with so much, change can only happen from within.

What would Zach do?

My son, Josh, led a leadership seminar with the title "What would Zach do?" Zach is his son. I'm borrowing this title and idea from Josh.

As many of you know, my husband had a stroke. At the time, Zach was preparing for his bar mitzvah. It was to take place in the same synagogue as my husband's own bar mitzvah celebration 58 years ago. It soon became obvious to all that Howard and I would not be able to go to New York for that occasion. So Zach and his parents had a decision to make. The parents left it up to Zach. Children surprise us. Zach's reasoning throughout this whole event amazed all of us who know him so well and perhaps, were ready to sell him short. Many adults think: "Kids! What do they know? Kids! What are they capable of?"

Zach thought: "I have only one Saba [grandfather in Hebrew]. He can't travel here, so we should go there for the bar mitzvah." This was a big sacrifice, but somehow he didn't see it that way.

Can we as a community sometimes understand our own decisions and actions in so simple a manner? If they won't come here, we should go there. It reminds me of Abraham's decision to move his entire camp so that his nephew's crew could choose their land and the fighting between sheep herders would stop. There was no arguing about who was correct – no negotiating, no side battles.

But that wasn't the end of our story, or even the most poignant leadership moment. On the big day itself, Zach assumed a role no one could have envisioned.

The time came in the Shabbat service for Zach to start reading the Torah. But Saba was not there. We were late. Oy! So Zach told his father: "I came here to share my bar mitzvah with my one grandfather. It makes no sense for me to start before he gets here. Let's wait."

What to do? Could an entire congregation wait?

Howard was their rabbi emeritus, but there is a principle of Jewish law that we don't place a burden on the entire community (tircha d'tsibburah). How can the service be stopped and everyone be made to wait? So Zach got up to give a speech. He would teach the congregation some of his grandfather's Torah – the teachings that Howard had taught Zach over the years. An impromptu speech followed. Slowly but surely, with help from others, Zach had his way. Everyone waited until his grandfather arrived and he could start properly.

Aside from bragging, what's my point?

Zach led the congregation that day with straightforward logic. His ritual passage into Jewish manhood ended up being a real rite of transformation. He demonstrated for us an adult understanding of the purpose of the ritual and celebration. His community centred on family, and for him his grandfather was a central pin. To pull that pin out was to remove a core. We could not. Moreover, he wasn't shy in front of other rabbis and congregants to state his need and his view. He was Zach, a person with a perspective, and he counted. So he could tell us to wait. And he was right.

Norma Baumel Joseph

Josh used this quote from the late management professor Peter Drucker to further the discourse: "Management is doing things right; leadership is doing the right things."

In this context, doing things right would have meant continuing services in a timely pattern. That is usually the correct approach, for surely we cannot establish a pattern whereby the congregation waits for latecomers. But leaders recognize those times when doing the right thing requires leaving the secure path of the way things are always done and following a new need.

In the future, I will ask myself, "What would Zach do" when faced with students whose needs or course work differ from university protocol.

Finally, I must add that while all this was buzzing in my head, I realized that there were narratives in the biblical text that have bothered me because I thought they represented examples of the ends justifying the means. But after this experience, I began to re-examine them in light of Zach, and I now think of many as stories in which the actors did the right thing, instead of doing things correctly.

The new Egypt poses fresh challenges to Israel

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In an announcement earlier this month, Egypt's military rulers proclaimed Jan. 25 as an official holiday to mark the first anniversary of the 18-day national uprising that led to the ouster of Hosni Mubarak's authoritarian regime. Roughly 800 protesters were killed during that brief rebellion, which doomed a secular, pro-western government that broadly honoured Egypt's historic peace treaty with Israel.

While many Egyptians regard the holiday in celebratory terms and look forward to the day when Egypt will truly be a beacon of democracy in the Arab world, Israel is wary, fearing the unintended consequences of democratization.

Free elections in the Gaza Strip in 2006 brought Hamas – Israel's Islamist arch-enemy – to power. Now, in Egypt, two formerly banned Islamic fundamentalist political parties that are just as unfriendly to Israel, the Muslim Brotherhood and Al-Nour, have won about two-thirds of the seats in parliamentary elections.

Egypt is thus on the cusp of acquiring an Islamic government.

Reading the handwriting on the wall, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently predicted that Israel cannot realistically expect to have the same level of "intimacy" with the new Egypt.

Although he observed that Egypt has a vested interest in preserving its 1979 peace treaty with Israel, a cornerstone of Israel's strategic doctrine, he added a telling caveat: "We may find ourselves in an environment more hostile than ever."

More ominously still, Netanyahu noted that Israel cannot solely rely on the peace treaty for its security in the south, warning that it "could come undone."

Since the momentous uprising in Egypt, a by-product of the so-called Arab Spring in the Middle East, Israel has increased military spending and upgraded defences adjacent to the porous Egyptian border.

Along the entire frontier, Israel is continuing to build a security fence, which was originally envisaged as a barrier to stem the infiltration of illegal migrants from Africa.

Since Mubarak's downfall, Israel has had reason to be concerned by developments in the Arab world's historically most important, and populous, country.

A wide range of Egyptian politicians have questioned the peace treaty, although the head of Egypt's ruling military council, Field Marshal Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, has declared that previously signed agreements will be respected.

The Muslim Brotherhood, however, has projected a mixed message. It has called for a review of the treaty, and one of its spokesmen has recommended that it be subjected to a referendum. The party's vice-chair, meanwhile, has said that relations with Israel will be determined by its treatment of the Palestinians.

Al-Nour, which is more radical than the Muslim Brotherhood, has indicated it will respect the treaty.

Egypt's former prime minister, Essam Sharaf, has said that the Camp David accords, which underpin the treaty, is not "a sacred thing and is always open to discussion." Nabil El-Araby, the Egyptian secretary general of the Arab League, has said the treaty is not as sacred as the Qur'an.

One of the treaty's most ardent defenders in Egypt is its former ambassador to Israel, Mohammed Bassiouny, who served from 1988 to 2001. By his reckoning, it enabled Egypt to regain the Sinai Peninsula, stabilized the region, enhanced the importance of the Suez Canal flows and Egypt's ties with the West, and increased foreign investment.

Nevertheless, many Egyptians want to revoke the treaty. According to a Pew Research Center poll conducted last year, 36 per cent of Egyptians are in favour of maintaining it, while 54 per cent want it scrapped.

Observers were not surprised by the results of this survey. On the grassroots level, as well as in intellectual circles, anti-Israel sentiments run deep in Egypt.

Last September, in an unprecedented turn of events, the Israeli embassy in Cairo was sacked as police stood idly by. The attack, which came on the heels of an incident in which a protester climbed up to the embassy and tore down the Israeli flag, forced Israel to evacuate the building and fly most of its diplomats home.

Prior to these events, thousands of Egyptians marched to the Israeli consulate in Alexandria on two separate occasions, chanting pro-Palestinian slogans and demanding a complete halt in Egypt's co-operation, such as it is, with Israel.

Israel, too, is concerned by the deteriorating security situation in the Sinai Peninsula. Last August, a band of Palestinian terrorists crossed into the Sinai from the Gaza Strip and murdered eight Israelis, six civilians and two soldiers, in the Negev. Israel retaliated, killing six Palestinians. Amid the fighting, Israel accidentally killed several Egyptian policemen and soldiers.

Egypt lodged an official protest and threatened to recall its ambassador in Tel Aviv, but was dissuaded from doing so by the United States. Israel defused the crisis by issuing a statement of regret for the deaths of the Egyptians.

Given the lawlessness that has prevailed in the Sinai since 2011, Israel has permitted Egypt to station more troops there than allowed by the Camp David accords.

But the deployments have not made much of a difference so far. Although Egypt claims that the security situation is well in hand, smugglers transporting arms into Gaza are operating freely, and the pipeline there that supplies Israel with 40 per cent of its gas has been blown up 10 times since last spring.

These repeated acts of sabotage emboldened Netanyahu to say that Egypt has had a "hard time" controlling the Sinai. Strangely enough, Netanyahu's comment angered Egypt's ambassador to the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Othman, who claimed that Israel is plotting to retake the Sinai.

The pipeline issue has aroused indignation in Egypt.

Egyptians who are critical of the 2005 deal in which Egypt agreed to ship gas to Israel for the next 20 years contend that Mubarak, his son and their cronies improperly negotiated the sale of gas to Israel at disadvantageous prices. Amid the furor, the former minister of energy and five ministry employees have been arrested, having been accused of cheating the state out of more than $700 million.

Mohammed Bassiouny

Much to Israel's concern, Egypt has loosened border controls at the Rafah crossing leading into Gaza. During the Mubarak era, the border was opened only sporadically, ensuring that terrorists did not slip into Israel.

To Israel's additional annoyance, Egypt has established better relations with Hamas. Last May, Egypt brokered a Fatah-Hamas reconciliation agreement, which remains unimplemented. Egypt claimed that the pact would end Palestinian divisions and thus uplift the prospects for peace with Israel. Israel has warned that Hamas' inclusion in the Palestinian Authority will dash the chances for peace.

In yet other signs of the times, Egypt permitted the passage of two Iranian warships through the Suez Canal for the first time in three decades and informed Israel that Jewish pilgrims will no longer be able to visit the tomb of Yaakov Abu Hatzira, a revered 19th-century rabbi, in the Nile Delta.

And in line with its traditional Mideast policy, Egypt has continued to criticize Israel's settlement activities in eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank.

It's evident that Israel faces a new reality in Egypt since last year's uprising.

I feel fortunate to follow in my father's footsteps.

My father grew up in a world of uncertainty and volatility. He came to Canada, worked hard to build a successful business and a stable life for his family. Part of that stability is the Romspen Mortgage Fund which has delivered a reliable fixed income to both of us each and every month. It's important that my father has an investment he trusts. Knowing that he doesn't have to worry is very comforting to me.

Sledge hockey champ to speak about literacy struggles

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Paul Rosen

Paul Rosen, a Canadian sledge hockey gold medallist, is not only a winner on the ice. Having recently confronted his secret struggle with reading and writing, the Thornhill, Ont., native has become a literacy awareness champion.

On Jan. 27, Rosen will take part in ABC Life Literacy Canada's Family Literacy Day and spread his message about the importance of learning. Rosen will make an appearance at the Hershey Centre, where the Ontario Hockey League's Mississauga Majors and Peterborough Petes are scheduled to battle on the ice.

Family Literacy Day is a national initiative created by ABC Life Literacy Canada in 1999 to raise awareness of the importance of reading and engaging in other literacy-related activities as a family.

While hockey and skating are classic Canadian pastimes, they also teach great life lessons, said Rosen, a Life Literacy Ambassador and Family Literacy Day spokesperson.

"Sport offers tremendous learning opportunities, whether you play the game or watch it from the stands. I will be teaching fans a bit about sledge hockey and challenging lucky fans to take part in an on-ice competition. It's going to be a fun night of learning and growing together."

Rosen, 51, suffered a leg injury during a hockey game as a teenager. The damage, infections and pain plagued him for years, until his lower leg was amputated when he was 39. During rehabilitation, Rosen became interested in sledge hockey – ice hockey for people with physical disabilities – and within one year, he made the Canadian National Sledge Hockey Team.

At age 41, Rosen was the oldest rookie in the history of the sport when he played for Team Canada at the 2002 Salt Lake City Paralympics. At the 2006 Games in Torino, the Canadian team won the sledge hockey gold medal.

While Rosen is currently ranked as the number 1 sledge hockey goaltender in the world, he says overcoming his challenges with reading and writing has been equally fulfilling.

After six months of courses, he went from a Grade 6 reading level to a university reading level. He said he was inspired to go public with his story after Jacques Demers, a former head coach in the NHL, who is now a Canadian senator, revealed his own struggles with literacy a few years ago.

"This doesn't have any boundaries," Rosen said. "You can be anyone in the spotlight and still have difficulties with reading and writing. It's not your fault."

Rosen said his eldest daughter, who recently had a baby, really pushed him to improve his abilities. "She wanted me to go back and confront my demons from school and show myself that I'm capable of accomplishing anything. I did it for myself and my kids. I can now sit down and read to my grandson."

At the Jan. 27 event, Rosen said he will stress to attendees how anything is possible when you put your mind to it. "Literacy is so important. Reading, writing, education is so important. You can go anywhere in the world by reading a book. If there's a challenge in your life, take it as an opportunity, not an obstacle."

He said being an ABC Life Literacy ambassador is a huge honour. "Education was never something I took seriously growing up. I never read books. I was always ashamed of my struggles. I'm thrilled to have the opportunity and responsibility now to get adults to realize that they don't have to feel embarrassed."

Rosen is now in midst of writing his own life story. "It sends out the message that anything is possible. Dreams can come true, and to believe in someone is so much more rewarding than giving up on them," he said.

Multiculturalism based on 'flawed logic:' prof

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Salim Mansur is an immigrant who questions open immigration; a member of a visible minority who's a fierce critic of multiculturalism, and a Muslim who's pained by criticism of his prophet but who would never contemplate penalizing someone for their words.

Last week, the native of India delivered an impassioned defence of individual rights and Enlightenment values while denouncing multiculturalism's collectivist mindset that would put group rights ahead of the individual.

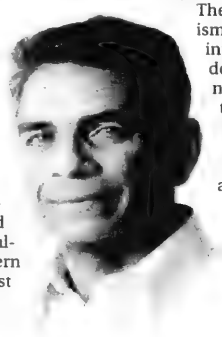
Canada should rid itself of the policy of multiculturalism, which "is based on the fatuous assertion that all cultures are equal," he told about 50 people at a lunchtime address sponsored by Advocates for Civil Liberties and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Mansur, a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario and a newspaper columnist, recently published Delectable Lie: A Liberal Repudiation of Multiculturalism.

The principle of multiculturalism was from its inception, "based on flawed logic and bad faith," he said. Canadian values derive from the Enlightenment's stress on individual rights. "Multiculturalism comes in and is the acid that eats into it."

Bringing an academic's analytical tools to bear on the issue, Mansur said the idea of multiculturalism arose during the 1960s – a troubled decade in which the Cold War was heating up, race relations were hostile, cities were burning, political leaders were being assassinated and students led a revolt in Paris. Following two world wars and anti-colonial struggles, western intellectuals and political leaders "lost their sense of conviction about their own history."

Responding to this "crisis of the spirit" they promoted the idea that all cultures were equal.



Salim Mansur

It was a view that was barely questioned – in certain circles. "To be progressive at the time, the idea was to trash your own culture and civilization," Mansur stated.

Former prime minister Pierre Trudeau introduced the concept into Canadian law in 1971, and support for multiculturalism spread to other western democracies. But in the last year, the leaders of France, Germany, Britain and Holland have all questioned its merits, and the Canadian public has never been as enthusiastic for it as have the country's political and media elite, Mansur said.

"Forty years later, you can see how utterly weak those arguments were... How is the culture of the Taliban equal, when you consider how they discriminate against women and other religions?"

If support for multiculturalism continues unabated, Mansur predicted a vastly different Canada. "Fifty years from now, if all cultures are equal why not have sharia (Islamic) law in Canada" or Sikh or Hindu law for people of those backgrounds, he asked.

Today, "judges are confused," human right commissions try to stifle free speech and students feel stifled on university campuses, he said.

The antidote to multiculturalism is promoting Canada's own intellectual heritage. "Liberal democracy itself is a culture. It's not some fuzzy idea. It is a culture that emanates through five centuries of historical struggle." It places "man as the measure of all things" and the liberal struggle is the struggle for individual freedom, he said.

Adding to the "bad logic" that substituted group rights for individual ones was the "bad faith" approach by politicians who saw multiculturalism as a means to gain favour with hyphenated Canadians, Mansur said.

He called for repeal of Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which regulates online hate speech.

And he urged the audience to "respect and engage each other as individuals" and to advance traditional Canadian values of individual rights in their own corner of the world.

Kenney honours Wallenberg

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Canadian government paid tribute to Raoul Wallenberg last week.

Jan. 17 was Raoul Wallenberg Day in Canada, and Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, issued a statement commemorating the Swedish diplomat who helped save the lives of some 100,000 Hungarian Jews from certain death at the hands of the Nazis.

Raoul Wallenberg

Wallenberg disappeared under mysterious circumstances while in Soviet custody in 1945. While there's no definitive proof, he is presumed dead. He would have turned 100 in August of this year.

Kenney called Wallenberg "one of the greatest heroes of one of the darkest periods of human history."

"In 1985, Wallenberg became the first-ever honorary citizen of Canada," he said. "The government of Canada is committed to carrying on the legacy of Raoul Wallenberg and to being a leader in the international fight against antisemitism."

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), called Wallenberg "righteous among the nations" in his own statement issued Jan. 17.

He said Raoul Wallenberg Day serves two purposes: first, that "even a single person of conscience can have an extraordinary impact."

Second, it's a day that should inspire Canadians to "continue to take a firm stand against evil."

"We can best honour his legacy by speaking up and taking action on behalf of those who face persecution around the world," Koschitzky said.

In related news, on Jan. 17, Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti was scheduled to issue a proclamation in council about International Holocaust Remembrance Day, which occurs every year on Jan. 27.

Also scheduled to be in attendance were members of the Azrieli Foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program.

Preschool teacher is 'queen of sensory'

By Frances Kraft

Robin Pamensky's supervisor at the Village Shul's Tots Together program, Esther Stein, calls her "the queen of sensory."

At the entrance to Pamensky's preschool classroom, where she works with two assistants, are "sensory" bins filled with winter-themed items. One has plastic shovels and little snowmen encased in rubber balls on a bed of artificial snow that is cold to the touch. Another holds child-sized mittens and Ziploc bags filled with blocks of ice, each surrounding a toy fish for "ice fishing."

Classroom activities also combine seasonal and holiday themes with a Jewish component. A "mitzvah mailbox" holds snowflake-shaped notes highlighting children's good deeds. Around Rosh Hashanah, Pamensky used apple-shaped notes, and notes shaped like leaves reflected an autumn theme.

Young children learn best through their senses, she said. Through free play, she explained, they learn about colour, volume, texture, and language, and at the same time develop their fine motor and cognitive skills.

Pamensky, 46, has a storage room in her house filled with shelves of items she has collected over the years to use in her classrooms. Many of her finds are toys related to sensory development.

Currently working with two- and three-year-olds three mornings a week, Morah Robin, as she's known to the children, has been at the preschool for eight years.

A native of Teaneck, N.J., Pamensky moved to Toronto with her family 15 years ago from Jerusalem. She and her husband, Moshe, a businessman and native of South Africa who moved here at 13, met in New York. Their large brood ranges in age from seven to 21.

Balancing work and home life hasn't been an issue for her. "You manage," she said. "I love what I do... I feel very fortunate."

She enjoys the "very warm, very nurturing" work environment at the shul, as well as its "Jewish ta'am," she said.

A graduate of Touro College with a BA in education and Judaic studies, Pamensky began her career as a Grade 1 teacher in New Jersey and worked as a tutor during the seven years she lived in Israel. She obtained her ECE certification after moving to Toronto.

A lesson from the teacher: "Each child is a star. Each child needs to shine. It's the responsibility of the teacher to identify each child's strength so that they will shine."

"I always loved teaching," she said of her passion for her work.

Before she returned to the classroom, while she was a stay-at-home mom, Pamensky wrote a children's book, Avi's Adventure in the Mitzvah Car, published by Gefen Publishing House in 1996. She submitted the book, a story in rhyme, on a whim, she said.

In the classroom, humour is useful, Pamensky finds. She might compliment a little girl on her dress, for example, then ask if she can borrow it.

The "key to being successful," especially with such young children, she said, is to be warm, inviting and nurturing, particularly when greeting them in the morning. "I try to have a great big smile, a nice tone, and I try to make each child feel special in some way."

Shaare Zedek ski fundraiser renamed for late lawyer

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation has renamed its annual Ski Day fundraising event On the Slopes for Candy in memory of Candy Schaffel Black, who passed away in January 2011.

Schaffel Black was a loyal donor and supporter of On the Slopes Ski Day and the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and participated in the annual fundraiser every year she was able.

This year's On the Slopes for Candy Snow Day will take place on Feb. 29 at Alpine Ski Club in Collingwood.

Schaffel Black was a well-respected Toronto lawyer who passed away a year ago after a long and brave battle with cancer. Throughout the 7-1/2 years of her treatment, she inspired her family, friends and colleagues with her courage and passion for life.

Schaffel Black and her husband, Philip Black, first became involved with the neonatal clinic at Shaare Zedek in Jerusalem when their eldest daughter was born three months prematurely. At that time, they began to support the neonatal intensive care unit (NICU) at Shaare Zedek financially, as well as through volunteerism and by creating a relationship with Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

Her roles as a mother of three daughters and as a daughter were of paramount importance in her life and she wanted every woman to experience this joy.

Proceeds from the event will be used to purchase critically needed medical equipment for the NICU at Shaare Zedek.

More than 14,000 babies were born at Shaare Zedek in 2011, making Shaare Zedek's maternity department the most active in the country. The NICU serves approximately 700 high-risk infants annually.

Over the past 15 years, On the Slopes has raised approximately $600,000 to support the hospital in providing life-saving patient care and advanced medical treatment for the population it serves. Shaare Zedek relies heavily on the generosity of donors in the Diaspora, as it doesn't receive any funding from the Israeli government.

For tickets or to make a donation to the On the Slopes for Candy Snow Day, call 416-781-3584 or register online at www.ontheslopes.ca

Nortel justice system

The mention of Nortel Networks makes many a Canadian cringe. Once the darling of the tech world and the most heavily weighted stock in the Toronto Stock Exchange, today it serves as symbol of failure. The worst one can wish upon a company is wondering if it's another Nortel. The recent sale of its 6,000 patents marked the end of a company that once had a market capitalization of $398 billion.

I write these words as opening arguments are scheduled to be heard in the fraud trial of three of its past executives. It seems that trials of this sort always involve companies that have lost, or are in the process of losing, lots of money. When everyone is making money, people tend to ask fewer questions. This is most unfortunate, as it is highly unlikely that levels of deceit – and their less offensive cousin, cutting corners – are much lower in successful than non-successful companies.

Reading about the trial brought to mind (at least) three basic differences between the approach of secular law and Jewish law in dealing with white collar crime.

The executives are being tried for fraud over $5,000. One of the fundamental rules of Jewish justice is that cases must be tried on a first-come, first- serve basis. A case of $10 million or even $1 billion may not bump a case worth five cents. Justice isn't a numerical concept, but one of fairness and equity, and theft is theft, irrespective of the sum involved.

While it's true that the harm caused to others increases as the numbers increase, a failure to conduct oneself honestly runs much deeper. All theft demonstrates a lack of faith in the Creator and destroys the moral fabric of a person, not to mention the harm done to others. Requiring repayment to the victim – both of the amount stolen, and in most cases a fine equal to such amount – recognizes such harm. Incarcerating people was to be limited to those who posed a physical threat to others.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

With the massive dollar amounts of today's cheating executives, amounts that were inconceivable in talmudic times, it's generally impossible to fully compensate the victim. Nonetheless, at no point would one who owes money be able to declare bankruptcy, freeing them from repayment and allowing perpetrators of fraud to later enjoy a luxurious lifestyle without full restitution. Future earnings above a very basic subsistence level would be earmarked for the victims.

As the trial begins, it's instructive to note a basic distinction in acceptable testimony. It's most difficult for people to be objective about themselves. As our sages note, "a person is close to him or herself." Therefore, neither self-incriminating testimony nor that of a close relative is admissible in a Jewish court of law. Nonetheless, there is an exception to this rule: someone who admits that due that to his criminal activity he owes another person money would be obligated to pay. Yet we would not accept the testimony of one who enters a plea bargain to gain a lesser sentence by snitching on his colleagues. Not only does this carry moral rancour, but one cannot trust such testimony even if given under oath.

Book examines haredim through their popular literature

The ideology of modern-day haredi (fervently Orthodox) Judaism is, people imagine, straightforward. Haredim ostensibly derive all their values from classical Jewish texts and traditions and eschew modernity, except in those rare cases when it coincides with Jewish tradition. But Yoel Finkelman's new book, Strictly Kosher Reading: Popular Literature and the Condition of American Orthodoxy, raises doubts about this view.

In this readable and interesting book, Finkelman builds his case by analyzing haredi popular literature, mostly North American works written in English. Popular haredi writing today ranges over many genres. It's not surprising to see apologetic literature that defends haredi Judaism or books that deal with perceived conflicts between science and religion. But there is a surprising variety of other types, including children's literature, cookbooks, works of fiction, parenting books, marital guides and other pop-psychology "self-help" books. Most of these genres were not on the traditional Jewish bookshelf before the 20th century.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

The crux of Finkelman's argument arises out of the content of the books. He recognizes that not all haredi books of any genre have the same values. For example, some of the books that deal with conflicts between science and religion simply assert that all truth is to be found in Torah. Any science that appears out of sync with Torah is automatically incorrect. (This model of dealing with conflicts between science and religion does have precedent in some pre-modern Jewish communities.)

But Finkelman also analyzes haredi books that see science as a legitimate source of truth and try to reconcile that truth with Torah. He contrasts current haredi books of this nature with the harmonizations proposed by medieval Jewish thinkers such as Saadya Gaon and Maimonides. The medievals, Finkelman notes, asserted that the task of harmonizing science and religion was difficult. Modern haredim assert that it is perfectly simple. The medievals accepted the dominant science and philosophy of their own day and strove to show how Judaism was truly consonant with those systems. Contemporary harmonizing haredi literature finds and highlights fringe scientific opinions (for example, those of creationists) that align with haredi truth claims. Haredi proponents of this approach need to explain why real scientific truth is found only in the works of non-mainstream scientists. They argue that truth is found through scientific inquiry only if the inquiry is free of the incorrect secular preconceptions that allegedly characterize establishment scientists. Finkelman sharply concludes: "If secular scientists can be led wrong by bias, how can haredi apologists rely on science for their own demonstrations, and how can they be sure that their own reasoned arguments might not be similarly coloured by self-interest? I have not seen any reflection on this question in haredi popular theological literature."

Finkelman also discusses another tension that one finds in contemporary haredi literature. Modern haredi self-help books often promote the idea that their message, like everything else in haredi Judaism, has not changed. But he shows just how many modern cultural values really are found in these books. Some of his most telling examples are drawn from the genre of parenting books.

Finkelman analyzes a number of modern haredi parenting books that unabashedly promote what he labels "the modern American notion of affectionate, child-centred parenting." Yet traditional Jewish literature leads to the conclusion that in Jewish households before the second half of the 20th century (just as in gentile households then) children were regularly disciplined with corporal punishment and repeatedly reminded of their proper place (occasionally seen, rarely heard) which was hardly at the centre of the household. In the past, Jewish texts from the Bible and rabbinic literature were often cited to promote these stricter parenting practices (e.g. "He who spares the rod hates his son," Proverbs 13:24). But now, haredi parenting books are singing almost the same song as the relatively permissive post-Spock secular parenting manuals.

Finkelman notes that some haredi writers simply deny that any change has taken place, insisting that their permissive parenting handbooks represent the same approach that Judaism has always promoted. The fact that their approach appears similar to modern secular parenting books is because secular childrearing experts have allegedly finally learned the old-time Jewish way of raising children. But other haredi writers acknowledge the novelty of their approach and try to defend it with the standard "times have changed" argument that is most often associated with other Jewish denominations. For example, Rabbi Shlomo Wolbe, according to Finkelman "one of the most renowned musarists [teachers of traditional Jewish ethics] of the second half of the twentieth century," suggests that "in previous generations, the situation was different. Children had more tolerance, and therefore they could tolerate spanking. Children also had stronger character… If someone [today] tries to crush a child by spanking him, he can hurt the child and his relationship with the child." Prolific haredi author, Rabbi Dr. Abraham Twerski, has, according to Finkelman, "dedicated much of his career to spreading the idea that the Orthodox community must gain a richer understanding of psychology and psychiatry in order to treat dysfunctional or abusive behaviour." On the issue of childrearing, Rabbi Twerski has written: "The challenges and stresses of modern-day parenting are both qualitatively and quantitatively greater than those confronting earlier generations." Accordingly, "we cannot have recourse to practices of the past."

Finkelman, a modern Orthodox Jew, teaches Torah at a number of modern Orthodox religious seminaries in Israel. He teaches academic subjects at Bar-Ilan University. He writes that his book should not be seen as modern Orthodox bashing of haredim but as an academic attempt to understand haredi society through reading haredi books.

Judging from his tone, perhaps he has accomplished that goal. His message is never as strident as, for example, what Peter Beinart wrote recently (in the online newspaper the Daily Beast): "Haredi Judaism – it can never be stressed too often – is not Judaism as it was practised in centuries past." Finkelman concludes more gently: "Contemporary haredim are profoundly acculturated." They have "converted many aspects of general culture, koshering them, turning them into Torah." My own conclusion from reading this book is that North American haredim generally practice a modern-lite version of Orthodox Judaism.

Reena in the News

Reena

Ryan Garnet and Sally Wasserman's magnetic personalities draw people into the gift shop.

The Reena Gift Shop provides an exciting opportunity for Reena participants to develop vocational skills in sales and service by working in the gift shop. Every Wednesday, participants from the Pathways Program, with a staff person as coach, learn the prices of the merchandise, help to ensure the presentation is attractive and dust free, assist customers, handle change and collate the money. Because of all the unique and sought after merchandise carried in the gift shop, it can be a very busy and exciting place to work.

Fridays are a particularly fun time to visit the gift shop with the presence of a very special couple who together have transformed the shop into a boutique with pizzazz! Whether or not visitors to the shop need something particular, they make it their business to drop in for a quick chat and a laugh. Ryan Garnet, a participant of the Pathways Program, is an extremely friendly and persuasive young man. If you hadn't planned on purchasing something, not to worry – he'll find your soft spot and with his great sales ability, win you over. His incredible partner is none other than Sally Wasserman, his grandmother, who has been volunteering in the Reena Gift Shop since May 2009. Nothing is too difficult for Sally. She shops for great merchandise, solicits donations and nobody works harder to set up the shop with flair. Sally is a wonderfully warm, loving and positive influence on Ryan and everyone at Reena is charmed by her appealing personality. What a team they make and how very lucky we are to have such a dynamic duo around. The expression "double your pleasure, double your fun" fits them perfectly. May they continue to spread their magic for many years to come!

When you are in the area of the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre on Clark Avenue, drop in and buy great gifts for family and friends at Reena's Gift Shop.

Sinai is becoming a Hamas stronghold

A critical threat has been developing on Israel's southern border with Egypt. Although it has received relatively little media attention, the Egyptian army has all but yielded control of the Sinai Peninsula to Bedouin tribes who have allied themselves with Hamas and other radical forces.

The growing lawlessness that has resulted poses a major security challenge not only to Israel but to Jordan as well. These groups are using Egyptian territory, which they consider to be immune to pre-emptive Israeli military operations (such as the occasional IDF attacks on Hamas' bomb-making factories and smuggling tunnels in Gaza), to build massive weapons caches and establish a staging ground for attacks on Israel.

Yaakov Katz, the Jerusalem Post's military affairs correspondent, reported late in 2011 that "Hamas has established forward bases and rocket production facilities in the Sinai Peninsula in an effort to protect them from Israeli air strikes." Katz further noted that Israel had tried prevailing upon the Egyptian government to take control and restore order – even allowing Egypt to bring in more troops than permitted under the Camp David agreement. Cairo responded by issuing an official denial that there had been any such breach of its sovereignty.

It's important to recall that, last August, the IDF pursued gunmen who fled back into the Sinai after murdering eight Israeli civilians just across the border in southern Israel. When five Egyptian policemen were accidently killed in the subsequent shootout, the outrage in Cairo (which led to an assault on Israel's embassy and the evacuation of the ambassador and embassy staff) prompted Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak to apologize for the incident. Such is the concern in Jerusalem about the delicate state of the Israel-Egypt peace treaty in this post-Mubarak "Arab Spring" era.

Hamas and other Palestinian factions (Islamic Jihad and the Popular Resistance Committees), working with Bedouin tribes, have also reportedly brought weapons into the Sinai that were looted from Libya's military warehouses when Gadhafi's regime fell. These include missiles and Russian-made shoulder-launched rockets that can be used against aircraft flying out of Ben-Gurion Airport.

For years, the Bedouin have profited from smuggling weapons into Gaza, mainly through the tunnels running from the town of Rafah. But since the fall of Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak and the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood (of which Hamas is an offshoot), the smuggling has increased in multiple directions. That is, weapons are also flowing into Gaza from other sources, including Iran, Sudan and Libya.

One reason is that Hamas feels increasingly emboldened by the Brotherhood's fortunes, in particular in Egypt's recent parliamentary elections, which saw the Brotherhood and Salafist parties capture more than 65 per cent of the seats. To make matters worse, the Sinai's Bedouin, on at least nine occasions, have sabotaged the Egyptian pipeline that provides Israel and Jordan with a substantial portion of their gas.

By far the most detailed publicly available account of what is transpiring in the Sinai is Israeli journalist and author Ehud Yaari's 20-page report titled Sinai: A New Front, published this month by the Washington Institute.

Ya'ari notes that in late 2010, even before Mubarak's ouster, "Hamas was already in the process of transferring heavy long-range missiles to secret storage places in the Sinai, including Grad rockets and extended-range Qassams. On Oct. 6 of that year, the Israeli port of Eilat and its Jordanian sister town of Aqaba were hit by a salvo of missiles fired from the Sinai."

This process has escalated since Mubarak was deposed. "Today," writes Ya'ari, "a significant number of Hamas military operatives are permanently stationed in the Sinai... A solid network of the group's contact men, safe houses, and armories covers much of the peninsula. In addition, Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, and other factions have been moving some of their explosives workshops... from Gaza to the Sinai on recent months. In many ways, the Sinai has become a sort of hinterland for Hamas military forces in Gaza."

It's a hinterland other journalists might want to explore.

The ever-changing face of Shabbat dinners

One of the finest traditions of the Jewish religion is the weekly custom of Shabbat dinner.

The beauty of Shabbat rests in its consistency to bring families and friends together, apart from the stress, pressure and unpredictability of everyday life. Above all, Shabbat dinners exist as a reminder to separate trivial matters from what is truly important.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

I grew up devoted to Shabbat dinners. Every week, I eagerly anticipated the comfort of being among my immediate family in either Toronto or Montreal. The location of the weekly gathering was insignificant, as long as familiar faces were discernible.

My concept of Shabbat has evolved and changed over the past few years. Three years ago, my maternal grandfather passed away.

Shabbat for me then changed dramatically. His seat at the head of the table is now vacant, and his soothing voice chanting the weekly prayers is absent. However, the invaluable lessons and knowledge he bestowed upon my family is what I miss the most.

Until you endure the profound loss of a grandparent, it is difficult to truly recognize and appreciate his or her remarkable wisdom.

When I was feeling a heavy void from the loss of my grandfather, the Shabbaton program at my high school, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, successfully revived my spirits.

I was given the opportunity to experience Shabbat with my closest friends in an organic and spiritual atmosphere. I began to cherish the opportunity of spending Shabbat with non-family members, who eagerly introduced me to new and fascinating Shabbat rituals.

Thus, the meaning of Shabbat deepened for me yet again, and I began to embrace the practice of spending Shabbat with other like-minded young adults, irrespective of our various backgrounds.

Graduating from the comfort of my high school to the University of Western Ontario (UWO) in London, Ont., was challenging.

In addition to being distanced from my family and our Shabbat traditions, I, too, left behind the familiarity of Shabbaton retreats.

Thankfully, Hillel at UWO works tirelessly to encourage Jewish students to continue participating in Shabbat dinners.

This past month, Hannah Gofman, Arielle Kaplan and Emma Leese, three Hillel members and students, organized the Shabbat Across London program.

The goal of the program was to conduct numerous Shabbat dinners among Jewish students in London in order to keep alive the tradition of Shabbat.

Groups or individuals signed up to host dinners, and were supplemented with Shabbat candles, two loaves of challah, a bottle of Manischewitz wine and a specially designed prayer book.

Thanks to Hillel, Birthright Israel and private donations from various Jewish camps, 21 hosts opened their homes to about 350 students.

Shabbat Across London was immensely successful in its ability to appeal to Jewish students of all denominations and backgrounds with the shared objective of celebrating Shabbat.

Similar to my experience on Shabbatons, I found my idea of Shabbat again shifted with a newfound reverence among my fellow Jewish students in London.

My latest modification of Shabbat is rather fresh. In my last column, I wrote about my intention to volunteer in Florida during my family winter vacation.

Unfortunately, this vacation never came to fruition. Receiving the dreadful call that my paternal grandfather in Montreal required emergency surgery resulted in my family immediately terminating our visit.

The endless hours spent in the hospital during my weeklong stay in Montreal were exhausting.

Nevertheless, once Friday evening came, it seemed only natural to congregate at my grandparents' home for Shabbat dinner. Though that dinner seemed somewhat quiet and far less vibrant than usual, I believe it was the mysterious and mystical power of Shabbat that was able to keep my family calm and optimistic and thus soon welcome a successful outcome.

I will forever be grateful that in the face of happiness, success and even loss and tragedy, Shabbat dinners will always remain a constant time of rest and reflection.

Research sheds light on predisposition to diabetes

Or Shmueli
NoCamels

Research carried out at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem has provided the first proof of molecular risk factors leading to Type 2 diabetes, providing an "early warning" sign that could lead to new approaches to treating this and other human disease conditions.

Despite extensive research on the molecular basis for the difference in susceptibility between individuals to common diseases, the subject is still poorly understood. A prime example of this is Type 2 diabetes, a very widespread human disorder.

What is it that characterizes the susceptibility to this disease? Epigenetic variations – which are small molecular marks superimposed on the DNA structure – have been frequently hypothesized to modify predisposition, but direct evidence was missing.

Now, a research team led by Dr. Asaf Hellman of the Hebrew University's Institute of Medical Research Israel Canada has developed a novel, multistep, study design involving the analysis of disease-contributing epigenetic variations among hundreds of patients and control individuals.

Up until this research was conducted it was customary to map the sequence of molecules in the DNA to find patterns that distinguish between patients who are diagnosed with diabetes and healthy individuals. The researchers hypothesized that an epigenetic mark is affected by the environment we live in, such as the food we eat and chemicals or toxins we are exposed to. Their assumption was that epigenetic marks can prevent proper functioning of genes, causing diseases, even when the sequence of the DNA appear to be completely normal.

To examine the assumption, the researchers mapped the epigenetics of hundreds of patients with Type 2 diabetes, and compared them to the epigenetics of healthy individuals. The differences in the epigenetics were found in a large number of patients and revealed a clear-cut distinction between sick and healthy patients.

Hellman said that "this method of mapping epigenetics allows a much more efficient prediction of risks to the disease in young people that have not yet showed any other symptoms of the disease."

According to the researchers, the results shed new light on the mechanism of individual predisposition to the disease and perhaps to other complex diseases, such metabolic, autoimmune and psychiatric disorders.

The researchers from the Hebrew University hope that this discovery could contribute to future development of drugs and measures to prevent these diseases.

HAIR DONATION

Ehden Keselman, a Grade 7 student at Associated Hebrew Schools Danilack Middle School, recently cut her hair and donated it to the Pantene Beautiful Lengths program, which provides wigs for cancer patients. Her act was part of the school's Hineni (I am here) initiative, which encourages students to make a positive impact on the world. Ehden grew her hair after seeing her mom's best friend lose her hair while undergoing cancer treatment. It took her two years to grow and donate nine inches.

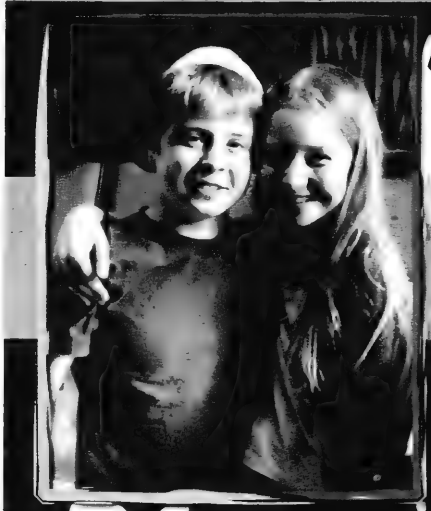
HEART HEROES: Once again, as they have for the past 11 years, Leo Baeck Day School students are taking part in the Heart and Stroke Foundation's Jump Rope and Hoops for Heart, raising more than $93,000 and teaching students the importance of healthy living and tikkun olam. Pictured are student "Heart Heroes" – Grade 8 ambassadors for the program – from left, Jessica Bargman, Samantha Steiner, Hayley Schwartzberg and Jonah Solomon.



SPELLING CHAMPS: Brother and sister Jonathan and Danielle Sharir-Smith beat 18 other contestants to win the annual spelling bee at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tzedec campus.

JPL to adopt innovative cataloguing system

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish Public Library (JPL) is about to become the first public library in the world to adopt a radically new cataloguing system that it says will make it easier to find exactly the book or other material sought.

The JPL will, in fact, be only the second library of any kind (the first was a Belgian academic institution) to switch to FRBR/RDA, an acronym commonly used for Functional Requirements for Bibliographic Records/Resource Description and Access.

This system ferrets out the not always obvious relationships among diverse resources in the database by describing a collection in an entirely new way.

FRBR/RDA is especially suited to the JPL because its close to 200,000-item collection is in five principal languages, said Eddie Paul, head of bibliographic and information services. Many of its titles are available in multiple editions and translations.

The system links resources in whatever language or form they are in, whether print or audiovisual.

The system is also a boon to a library specializing in Judaica.

"For example, we have a thousand works of the Bible, Talmud and other core Jewish canonical works in various forms, subsections, editions, portions and translations," Paul said. Depending on their religious or cultural backgrounds, people frequently ask for these works by different names.

"It becomes difficult for them to find the works by themselves without the mediation of a reference librarian."

When fully operational, the system will enable users to link, for example, the oldest book in the JPL collection, The Antiquities of the Jews by Flavius Josephus, written in Latin in 1481, to its newest edition, Iudeiskaia voina, published in Russian in Moscow in 1996.

Implementation of the new system will begin in February and take three or four months to complete, Paul said. "It involves a massive retraining of the cataloguers."

The new system will be available online. Just how ahead of the curve the JPL is can be appreciated when it is realized that even the Library of Congress is only starting to organize its new acquisitions under RDA rules, but is not using the FRBR data model yet, Paul pointed out.

FRBR/RDA is built on the Anglo-American Cataloguing Rules – Second Edition (AACR2), the standard in the English-speaking world for more than 40 years.

In Paul's opinion, AACR was outdated a decade after its introduction. "It's inflexible and not as user-friendly, intuitively and visually, as FRBR/RDA."

FRBR/RDA has caused "quite a stir in the library community," and there continues to be considerable resistance to its adoption, said Paul, who attributes this to discomfort with change rather than objective assessment of its value.

He predicts it will be only a few years before FRBR/RDA becomes standard.

"The JPL turns 100 in 2014 and, as a kind of birthday gift to ourselves, we are adamantly expressing our youthful ambition to remain contemporary and on the cutting edge of integrated library services technology, while at the same time trying to balance precarious budgets and the rapidly shifting ways in which people read and incorporate information," he said.

The JPL's collection is primarily in English, French, Yiddish, Hebrew and Russian, but it also includes many items in dozens of other languages, among them Polish, German, Spanish, Ladino and Aramaic.

Young adults come "Together"

Special to The CJN

Almost 800 young Jewish professionals recently attended "TOgether 2012" to party and support the United Jewish Appeal's 2012 campaign.

The lavish event, held Jan. 21 at the Royal Ontario Museum, transported guests back to a golden era of hip hop. The lineup of live entertainment included Maestro, Young MC (Bust a Move), Rob Base and DJ E-Z Rock (It Takes Two), Naughty by Nature and Rapper's Delight (formerly the Sugar Hill Gang).

Attendees were asked to make a donation to the 2012 campaign in order to participate in the evening, said Dan Horowitz, editorial director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Funds raised by annual campaign gifts will go toward the entire array of what UJA supports annually. Whether it's caring for our community's vulnerable, strengthening Jewish identity or standing with Israel, UJA annual campaign gifts ensure that Toronto is one of the great Jewish communities of the world," Horowitz said.

The event is "a vital initiative in that it will engage and educate the next generation of leaders throughout Jewish Toronto as to the full extent of UJA's reach," he added. "A gift to UJA connects us with our Jewish values and to each other so that we can create a compelling and caring community for today and ensure that Jewish Toronto continues to build for a better tomorrow."

Emily Burnett, who co-chaired the event with Jay Klein, said she got involved to help build "a sustainable movement" for UJA. "I thought it was important for our generation to begin a more widespread contribution to UJA, rather than leaving it to our parents' generation."

Klein said he has been "inspired and energized by seeing so many leaders in the community give their time and resources to UJA, so it feels good to be able to give something back that will engage so many people."

As young people grow, so, too, does their interest in giving back to their community, Horowitz said. "I think it's important for young people to start making their own gifts and to take ownership in our community. They should take pride in Jewish life in this great city and our responsibility to Israel and Jews in need everywhere."

While UJA's 2012 campaign closes on Feb. 9, there are still upcoming events. On that date, Richard Lewis, stand-up comic and star of Curb your Enthusiasm, will be the featured performer at Events on the Park. On March 1, the SMASH ping-pong tournament with celebrity players will take place at Koolhaus.

Hamas chief Meshal to leave post

Avi Issacharoff
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas chief Khaled Meshal will not seek re-election as the organization's political leader in forthcoming elections, he told a meeting in Khartoum three weeks ago.

There has been a widening rift between Hamas leaders in Gaza and those abroad. Palestinian analysts say Meshal recently realized that the Gaza leadership was determined to prevent his reappointment and decided instead to preempt them and quit.

However, the move may be intended to exert pressure on the Gaza leadership, which is demanding an increase in its power, and objects to the significant agenda changes advanced by Meshal.

The controversy between Hamas' leaders in Gaza and abroad focuses on the approach to Israel, the reconciliation between Hamas and Fatah, establishing a Palestinian state and, above all, the relations with Syria and Iran.

Hamas' Gaza leader, Ismail Haniyeh, and his advisers decided to prove to the organization's leaders who recently fled Damascus they could no longer impose their decisions on Gaza.

The Gaza leadership's position was bolstered by the realization that Meshal was trying to change Hamas' struggle strategy and lead it to an historic reconciliation with Fatah, while concentrating its energies on an Arab Spring-type struggle. Haniyeh, meanwhile, is sticking to his former stance, demanding to close ranks with Islamic Jihad.

Khaled Meshal

The head of Hamas' military wing in Gaza, Ahmed Jabril, has not said which side he supports yet.

Last November, Meshal said that Hamas was in favour of establishing a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders, joining Fatah and focusing on the "popular struggle" without the use of firearms.

Haniyeh reacted swiftly, declaring the armed struggle a strategic choice and Hamas' only way of achieving its goals. Haniyeh made it clear that a Palestinian state would be established on every inch of Palestine, and Hamas would never recognize Israel.

The confrontation between Haniyeh and Meshal escalated in the organization leadership's meeting in Khartoum, where Haniyeh openly criticized Meshal.

Thus, within a few weeks, Haniyeh –who was seen as one of the most pragmatic of Hamas' leaders – turned into a hawk showing Meshal the way out.

At the same time, Meshal's position weakened due to the fraying relations with Syria and Iran.

Syrian President Bashar Assad's weakness and the riots in Syria significantly reduced the funds Syria transferred to Hamas and reduced Hamas' training in Syria. Iran also reduced funds given to Hamas.

Hamas is trying to distance itself from Damascus and senior Hamas families have left Syria in recent months. Only a few senior Hamas officials remain in Syria.

The tension between Hamas and Iran has also increased, following Hamas' refusal to heed Iran's pleas that it stays in Damascus.

The Islamic Jihad movement in Gaza is rapidly coming closer to Assad's regime. At the end of December, the group sent dozens of activists to train in Syria and Iran. Palestinian sources reported that the move was made after Iran pressured the Jihad leadership to openly support Assad's regime. Tehran even hinted it would stop the financial support to Islamic Jihad unless it sends its activists to the training courses in Syria.

In related developments, an adviser to Hamas' prime minister said Haniyeh will visit Iran, Qatar and other Muslim countries at the end of the month.

Yusef Rizka says Haniyeh will embark on his second international trip outside the Gaza Strip. He returned last week from a tour of Egypt, Sudan, Turkey and Tunisia.

Hamas said the visits indicate the movement's increased international recognition, and the growing influence of Islamic groups in the region.

The Palestinian Authority, which is dominated by Fatah, has been concerned by the warm welcome Haniyeh has received.

EU adopts Iran oil embargo

JTA

BRUSSELS — The European Union adopted an oil embargo against Iran.

The embargo was approved Monday by the European Union's 27 foreign ministers during a meeting in Brussels.

Under the measure, part of sanctions over the Islamic Republic's nuclear program, the countries will impose an immediate embargo on new contracts with Iran for crude oil and petroleum products, and existing contracts must end by July 1.

Catherine Ashton

"The pressure of sanctions is designed to try and make sure that Iran takes seriously our request to come to the table," EU foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton said.

Iran says its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, while western nations are concerned that Iran is preparing to build nuclear weapons.

The EU sanctions come on the heels of new financial sanctions on Iran from the United States. The sanctions, in the law signed by President Barack Obama on Dec. 31, target third parties that deal with Iran's financial and energy sectors. The United States has already banned dealings by its own citizens with those sectors.

New EU sanctions approved Monday also include a freeze on the assets of Iran's central bank.

The new sanctions were met with additional threats from Iranian parliamentarians to close off the Strait of Hormuz, which would cut off much of the West's oil supply.

"In case of threat, the closure of the Strait of Hormuz is one of Iran's rights," senior parliamentarian Heshmatollah Falahatpisheh said. "So far, Iran has not used this privilege."

Netanyahu orders probe of mufti's speech

JTA

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered Israel's attorney general to open an investigation into Jerusalem's top Muslim cleric, who called for Jews to be killed.

Mufti Mohammed Hussein, speaking last week at an event celebrating the 47th anniversary of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement, cited a traditional text attributed to the Prophet Muhammad that says: "The hour of judgment will not come until you fight the Jews. The Jew will hide behind the stone and behind the tree. The stone and the tree will cry, 'Oh Muslim, Oh Servant of God, this is a Jew behind me, come and kill him.'"

A video of the mufti's speech was posted on YouTube by Palestinian Media Watch, and the group's account was frozen for several days over the content. The video also shows a man introducing the mufti, saying, "Our war with the descendants of the apes and pigs is a war of religion and faith. Long live Fatah!"

Netanyahu said Sunday that "these are grave words that the world needs to condemn."

Hussein told Israel Radio Sunday that he was just quoting the religious text, not calling for the murder of Jews. No Palestinian leader has condemned his words.

Newspaper owner apologizes for Obama assassination scenario

JTA

WASHINGTON — The owner of the Atlanta Jewish Times apologized for an opinion column in which he counted U.S. President Barack Obama's assassination as among Israel's options in heading off a nuclear Iran.

"I very much regret it. I wish I hadn't made reference to it at all," Andrew Adler told JTA on Friday.

He said he would publish an apology in his next edition, and that reaction from readers had been overwhelmingly negative.

Fox News reported late Friday on its website that the Secret Service was investigating the column. In his interview with JTA, Adler said he had not been approached by the Secret Service.

In a Jan. 13 column, Adler, who is also the paper's publisher, outlined what he said were three possible responses by Israel to Iran's acquiring a nuclear weapon: a pre-emptive strike against Hamas and Hezbollah, terrorist groups that he said would be emboldened by a nuclear Iran; a direct strike on Iran, and "three, give the go-ahead for U.S.-based Mossad agents to take out a president deemed unfriendly to Israel in order for the current vice-president to take his place, and forcefully dictate that the United States policy includes its helping the Jewish state obliterate its enemies."

He continued: "Yes, you read 'three' correctly. Order a hit on a president in order to preserve Israel's existence. Think about it. If I have thought of this Tom Clancy-type scenario, don't you think that this almost unfathomable idea has been discussed in Israel's most inner circles?"

Gawker, the U.S. gossip and media news website, first reported on the column Friday.

Ophir Aviran, the Israeli consul general in Atlanta, condemned the column "in the strongest possible terms."

In response to a JTA request for comment, Aviran said in an e-mail that he was "appalled at this deranged and morally repugnant assertion."

The Anti-Defamation League condemned Adler's column as "outrageous."

"An apology cannot possibly repair the damage," said the ADL's national director Abraham Foxman in a statement.

Foxman added that "Mr. Adler's lack of judgment as a publisher, editor and columnist raises serious questions as to whether he's fit to run a newspaper."

Israel Briefs

Anti-racism protest

Thousands of protesters demonstrated in Jerusalem against racism and discrimination against Ethiopians in Israel. Some 5,000 protesters marched in front of the Knesset Jan. 18 before proceeding to Zion Square for a rally. They carried signs: "Blacks and Whites – We're all Equal," "Social Justice" and "Stop racism." The protest came a week after hundreds of Israelis of Ethiopian descent and their supporters demonstrated in Kiryat Malachi against housing discrimination. A residential committee of a block of apartments in Kiryat Malachi reportedly signed residents to a contract committing that they would not rent or sell to Ethiopian Israelis.

Hackers retaliate

Israeli hackers said they brought down the websites of the Saudi Stock Exchange and the Abu Dhabi Securities Exchange. The hackers, who call themselves IDF-Team, said in a post on the PasteBin website that the attacks were in retaliation for the cyber attack the previous day on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and El Al's website, adding that "This is only the beginning." The Israeli hackers also threatened to paralyze websites for up to a month if attacks on Israeli sites continue. Saudi hackers used the PasteBin website last week to publish the credit card information of thousands of Israelis. Also last week, the pro-Israel hacker Hannibal published a list of e-mail addresses and Facebook passwords for some 30,000 users from Arab countries. He also claims to have information to allow access to 10 million Iranian and Saudi bank accounts.

Second murderer sentenced

Amjad Awad, 19, was sentenced last week to five consecutive life sentences in a military court for the murder of the Fogel family in Itamar last March. He was convicted in November for the March 11 murders. Awad also was sentenced to an additional seven years in prison on two counts of weapons trafficking and one count of conspiracy to commit murder, for a total sentence of 132 years in prison. The panel of judges said it had considered giving Awad the death penalty. The judges also said in their decision that Awad "doesn't have a fragment of regret in his heart." Awad and his cousin, Hakim Awad, murdered Udi Fogel, 36, and Ruth Fogel, 35, and their children, Yoav, 11; Elad, 4; and Hadas, 3 months, in a Shabbat eve attack on their home in the northern West Bank. Hakim Awad was sentenced in September to five life sentences plus five years, for a total of 130 years. Three of the Fogel children survived the attack. Two were sleeping in a side bedroom and were not discovered, and a daughter was out of the house at the time of the killings. She came home to discover the bodies.

TEL AVIV — It takes a big voice and a chunk of audacity to cover British star singer Adele's Rolling in the Deep – especially live on television. But that's exactly what Montrealer Kathleen Reiter did recently on the debut episode of the new Israeli Channel 2 reality show, The Voice.

Reiter, 23 – the same age as Adele – proved that she, too, has an impressive singing voice.

"I chose to sing Rolling in the Deep mostly because the song has so much soul and it does something to people, it moves them, and for me, this is what I look for when I'm performing onstage," Reiter told The CJN.

Although the story behind the participant is not meant to sway opinion on the show, Reiter's aliyah from Montreal has piqued interest among viewers and the judges alike. She arrived in Israel just a few days before the taping of the show.

"I am so proud of where I come from. I grew up in Montreal, and I think that just growing up there made me into this person that I am today," she said. "I take a lot of pride in where I come from. As a Jew, it was important for me to make a home here, in Israel, as well."

Reiter's parents are Israelis and she grew up speaking Hebrew, English and French at home – making her aliyah a little easier as she already speaks the language. She is the youngest of three siblings and says she is "a typical last child."

On a visit to Israel last summer, she heard about auditions for the The Voice and decided to try her luck. Reiter moved to Tel Aviv by herself, leaving her parents, brother and sister back in Montreal.

"I think it was the right thing for me," she said of aliyah. "As a Jew, I've always felt a strong sense of belonging in Israel, and this is what ultimately made me choose to live here."

It isn't by chance that her debut audition is still reverberating among Israeli television viewers. Reiter has taken voice-training lessons since she was 12 years old, focusing on pop and classical music. At the age of 15, while still a student at Herzliah High School, she won Montreal's first Jewish Idol competition organized by Centre Hillel.

"Jewish Idol was an amazing experience, and I can only hope that my journey on The Voice continues to be as amazing as my blind audition was," she said. All I can say is that I will certainly work very hard to make it happen."

The Voice is a vocal competition based on Holland's top-rated vocal talent discovery show, The Voice of Holland. It features three stages of competition: blind audition (the mentors/judges sit with their backs to the contestants and swivel their chairs around if they like the voice they're hearing and then court the contestant to their teams); battle phase (a vocal face-off between two contestants), and live performance (finalists compete during a live broadcast).

The four Israeli mentors/judges are Aviv Geffen, Sarit Hadad, Shlomi Shabat and Rami Kleinstein. The host is local television personality Michael Aloni.

The show is aired every Saturday night. The opening episode broke records for the Reshet production team with a 43.4 per cent rating of 1.6 million viewers. Reiter has her eye set on the final prize – a recording contract.

Although the show has only just begun, her powerful rendition of Rolling in the Deep has already made her a favourite. During the blind audition, she was the first contestant to prompt all four judges to turn their swivel seats and woo her to their teams. She even got Kleinstein to stand up and dance while she was singing.

"It was surreal. I couldn't believe that these four amazing artists were saying so many wonderful things," she said. "I have so much respect for all four of the mentors, and having them say these amazing things, it's humbling and I was just amazed."

On stage, she is a power ball of energy. "The stage is the place I am the most comfortable. It's my home," she said. "I'm usually very shy and quiet, but when I perform all that changes."

She chose Hadad as her mentor after the acclaimed Israeli songstress told Reiter that "it's all about girl power."

She also gives credit to her grandfather for her love of music. She told the judges that she remembers listening to him sing when she was younger and says she got her voice from him.

While the remaining auditions are still underway, the team behind The Voice continues to release short bio videos of the contestants who made the cut for the next round. Reiter's videos are hugely popular, with more than 70,000 hits already.

"I'm so proud to be a part of The Voice here in Israel," she said. "I came to Israel to have a new start. It's my dream to have a career in music. Hopefully, I can have a career in music in Israel."

Israeli trade in Muslim world an open secret

Shuki Sadeh
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Motti (not his real name), a businessman with connections in Arab countries, was stunned several months ago when representatives of a well-known Israeli food company asked him to check the possibility of exporting to Iran. They told him an Iranian company had approached them through contacts abroad.

Motti refused. He didn't want to violate the embargo. But since then, he said, he's discovered that quite a few local companies and businessmen trade indirectly with Israel's No. 1 enemy. So he wasn't shocked by a Bloomberg News story a few weeks ago about Allot Communications selling Internet surveillance and monitoring equipment to Iran over five years through a Danish distributor.

"Trade with Iran is an ancient story," said Prof. Uri Bialer of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, an expert in international relations who has researched ties between Israel and Iran. "Money has no smell. Iranians always try to do business, and there have always been Israelis with an eye for making money."

Nachum Shiloh, an expert on Iran and owner of Gulf Markets Intelligence, said for some Iranian businessmen it makes sense to import from Israel. "Here, we view Iran as the enemy, a demon," he explained, "but not every Iranian gets up every morning thinking of ways to destroy Israel. Iran has a large segment of businessmen who are not fanatics, people who want to make money and further their businesses – if they could only trade, even indirectly, with businesspeople and companies from Israel."

Sanctions threatened by Israel and the United States are intended to deter companies from considering ties, even indirectly, with Iran. But in today's reality, with crises weighing on western markets, there are companies ogling the Third World, with some finding markets in countries hostile to Israel. These countries also have many adoring fans of Israel's technology and products, but because of political sensitivities, everything must be done on the QT. Stickers and packaging saying "Made in Israel" must be removed and a bill of lading must be produced from an intermediary country, Turkey or somewhere in Europe.

"It's forbidden to talk about these things," said Dan Catarivas, director of the foreign trade and international relations division of the Manufacturers Association of Israel. "Israeli industrialists want to stay as far out of the spotlight as possible."

"Operating surreptitiously is inconvenient and involves hard work and investment, but sometimes there's no choice," said a senior official at a well-known Israeli high-tech company. "Our foreign competitors deal freely with Arab countries. It's worth entering these markets to narrow the gap even slightly."

Israeli business quietly thrives in Saudi Arabia and Iraq, and in countries like Indonesia and Malaysia. Company owners on both sides do all they can to avoid harmful publicity. Contacts are made at international conferences overseas, through European and U.S. companies familiar with both sides, and directly over the Internet.

"Technology, particularly the Internet, is making the world smaller," said Eliran Malul at Arab Markets, which brokers deals in Arab countries. "Arab entrepreneurs are interested in Israeli technologies and search them out through the Internet and social networks like Facebook, Twitter and LinkedIn."

Israel also uses businessmen and trade networks for political and commercial purposes. The state monitors activities of businessmen from Arab countries and enlists the help of Israeli businessmen in carrying out diplomatic missions and serving as intermediaries in clandestine intrigues. After it was revealed that ships belonging to the Ofer Group docked in Iran, foreign publications claimed the Ofer family's ships had for years helped Israeli agents infiltrate Iran.

Relations with Muslim countries extend far beyond the Middle East. In the late 1990s, the Foreign Ministry tried to establish trade with Indonesia and Malaysia. Muslim countries with strong economic potential but without diplomatic relations with Israel. It was the heyday of the Oslo accords and many believed Israel's economic ties to Muslim and Arab countries would become much more open and productive. Several years earlier, Koor Trade had opened an office in Indonesia and had begun establishing low-profile trading relations there.

Trade continues covertly with Indonesia at the lowest possible profile and without diplomatic relations. Singapore serves as a base for businessmen trying to penetrate there. In 2007, a subsidiary of Ormat Industries signed a $200-million contract to supply electricity for 30 years.

An Indonesia-Israel trade bureau was opened two years ago. Indonesia is one of the world's fastest growing markets, with great potential in the field of communications because of its population of more than 200 million. Clandestine trade is also carried out in the opposite direction. Israel imports eight times as much as it exports in its trade with Indonesia.

One of the most interesting countries for duality of relations is Saudi Arabia. Quite a number of Israeli companies export products to Saudi Arabia, including technological goods. This is sometimes done through their U.S.-registered subsidiaries.

Another interesting field is trade in plastics. Israel receives polyethylene and polypropylene, derived from petroleum production, from Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries. These materials are sent in a roundabout way, but Israeli authorities are aware of their source. Israel's plastics industry, in turn, exports greenhouse sheeting, irrigation drippers, house and garden products, disposable utensils and food packaging to Saudi Arabia. Some of these products are made in Turkish factories established by Israeli companies.

The wealthy Gulf countries are, without doubt, the most attractive places for Israeli business. As Dubai was building the Palm Islands real estate project, Israelis had a hand in providing some of the shingles through an Italian roofing tile company.

A fair number of Israeli high-tech companies operate in the Gulf states, with Israel exporting medical, agricultural and water technologies.

One field in which they are active is internal security – the oil fields in one of the states are protected by Israeli guards hired by an Israeli-owned security firm.

Naava Mashiah, who lives in Geneva and brokers deals in the Middle East, belongs to Israeli Peace Initiative, whose membership wants to establish an alternative to the political deadlock in the region.

In dealings in Arab countries, it's impossible to separate the political and business aspects, said Mashiah. "The Saudi [peace] initiative didn't get a response from Israel, and the Arab world sees this as an insult. The Israeli peace initiative, in a way, provides an answer to the standstill because it shows there are serious Israelis aware of the political situation and working to change it. Israel is becoming increasingly isolated in the world, and our group is trying to break this isolation. One way is by creating business ties with Arab countries."

Letters of a poet, on legal letterhead

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

EDITED BY ELIZABETH POPHAM

The dust cover of the recently released A.M. Klein: The Letters, edited by Elizabeth Popham (University of Toronto Press) tells its own melancholy tale. A portrait of the poet dressed in homburg and three-piece suit – de rigueur lawerly garb circa the 1940s – is paired with a letter from September 1951. Addressed to a major poet and editor of the period, Klein's neat script provides a "Declaration of Intentions" regarding his 1951 novel The Second Scroll.

But the letterhead atop this "Declaration" is that of Chait, Klein & Aronovitch, whose offices were on St. Catherine Street in Montreal. Klein's mix of professional pursuits arises in many anecdotes, as visitors to his law office found his desk spread with Milton or Shakespeare rather than legal files.

The autumn of 1951 is near the end of Klein's productive years. The Letters open in 1928, with a note regarding the acceptance of his work in the major American journal Poetry. By the end of 1951, there is a sense of great promise and productivity in the correspondence.

New York's Alfred A. Knopf has brought out The Second Scroll; Klein's work on James Joyce has found its way into the hands of major Joyce scholars; and he is in a position to promote the work of his protégé, Irving Layton, to his publisher.

Yet, in Klein's fifth decade the output of correspondence collapses, both in quantity and quality. The early 1950s offer a few long letters regarding proposals for Broadway projects that were not completed.

Klein accepts and then cancels a series of Canadian and American speaking engagements. By the fall of 1952 he tells his old friend and colleague Leon Edel that "because of other plans" he is putting his "Joyce work aside." Most abruptly, in 1956, he takes leave of his law career, writing to his firm and to the Bar Associations of Montreal and Quebec. After these turning points, though Klein lived until 1972, The Letters offers a bare skeleton – a handful of letters, two of which are sad, formulaic birthday greetings addressed to Sam Bronfman – representative of the final 16 years of Klein's life.

The Letters, revealing as they are of periods of great activity and then withdrawal, are effective at conveying the unpredictability of a writing life. The collection's editor, Elizabeth Popham, tells us in her introduction that letters to family are embargoed until 2022, so the dimensions that this correspondence might add remain unknown.

Other absences in The Letters are notable. There is no sustained correspondence with other writers. Klein exchanges letters with editors and publishers, sometimes revealing the meagre returns of writerly success: in 1944 the pay for the use of two poems in an anthology was four dollars. At times, the distractions provided by Klein's work for Sam Bronfman at Seagram's take on a darkly comic tone, as he acknowledges that he is "looking forward to reading" and providing editorial suggestions for a manuscript titled "History of Distillation." Chapters yet to be dealt with include "Bottles," "Corn" and "Humorous and Comic Tavern Signboards."

In the letters chosen by Popham, Klein rarely reflects on how his more prosaic responsibilities affected his goals and routines as a writer. Rather, he takes these pursuits for granted, or, defaults to them as literary work becomes more difficult to attend to. As early as 1945 he belittles his own reputation as a "leading Canadian poet." He writes, "I have been anthologized, publicized, criticized; as a writer on Jewish themes, re-circumcised. I have not been curtly ignored; I have been nodded at and then ignored." This is from a letter in which Klein introduces his poem The Portrait of the Poet as a Nobody to a California-based journal.

Klein's poetry has become central to Canadian literary life. Not too long ago Parks Canada declared him a National Historic Figure, and plans a commemorative marker for his longtime Montreal address on Hutchison Street. The Letters help us appreciate this status alongside the darker elements of a creative life.

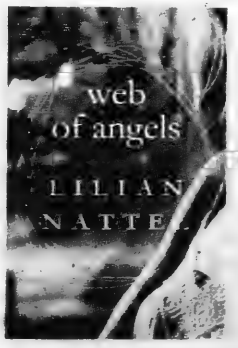
Novel tackles mental illness

Compiled by CJN staff

Just as Jodi Picoult tackles controversial contemporary issues in her compelling domestic dramas, bestselling novelist Lilian Nattel explores the vivid reality of what used to be called multiple personality disorder.

The Toronto-based writer interviewed 25 people with dissociative identity disorder (DID) for her upcoming novel Web of Angels (Vintage Canada), which will be released in early March.

The story follows Sharon Lewis who is a lot like any other happily married mother. She is the beating heart of a house full of kids, cooking and chaos, the one who always knows the after-school practice schedule; where her husband put the car keys and who needs a little TLC.



Life is definitely normal and good until the morning a friend of the family kills herself. The reverberations of that act, and the ugly secrets that sparked it, prove deeply unsettling for the whole family and stir up Sharon's own troubling secret: she has DID. Will she be able to persuade her quiet and respectable community that evil things can happen even in the nicest homes?

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish singer to represent Turkey in song contest

JTA

Turkey's Jews are pleased that, for the first time, a Jew will be representing their country at this year's Eurovision Song Contest.

But the singer, Can Bonomo, isn't exactly trumpeting his accomplishment in being chosen to compete with singers from other European countries – at least not the Jewish part.

"We would like to inform that Mr. Can Bonomo is bound to refuse answering all the questions about his religious beliefs, antisemitism and political subjects," Bonomo's spokesman, Ece Kahraman, wrote in a statement to JTA.

Bonomo has taken pains to tell fans that he will be participating in Eurovision as a Turk, not as a Jew.

"My family came from Spain 540 years ago," Bonomo said in an interview on the Aksam news show in a video posted Jan. 11 that has gone viral. "I am Turkish and I am representing Turkey. I will go out there with the Turkish flag and represent Turkey. I am an artist, a musician. That's all that everybody needs to know."

Prior to his appearance on Aksam, radical right-wing papers had accused Bonomo of being a tool of Zionists and Freemasons.

The anchor framed her question this way: "People might say you were chosen because Turkey wants to ingratiate itself with Israeli lobby groups," she said. "I would like to get your comments."

The intimation that the state-run Turkish Radio and Television Corp., which makes the Eurovision selection, would kowtow to pro-Israel groups seems a little bizarre with Turkey's moderate Islamist government doing its best to distance itself from Israel. One of the crises that fuelled the current tensions between the two countries, in fact, was the broadcast in 2010 on state-run TV of a drama series that portrayed Israelis as harvesting organs from Iraqis.

It is true that Bonomo's selection for the annual contest, which is being held this year in Azerbaijan in May, has sparked a glint of hope in Turkey's 20,000 Jews, who have watched anxiously as their country's historically strong relations with Israel have deteriorated.

Can Bonomo

"It is the first time in history that a talented young Turkish Jewish singer will represent Turkey in the Eurovision Song Contest," Derya Agis, a scholar of Turkish Jewish culture and history at Brandeis University, wrote on her Facebook page. "Turkey will show the importance of diversity in Europe where antisemitism, Islamophobia and xenophobia have been problems since centuries."

Or, put a little less academically by Denise Saporta, a spokeswoman for Turkey's Jewish community: "A Jewish boy is going to represent Turkey!" she told JTA. "We're all very proud."

Saporta downplayed the attacks on Bonomo, saying they are typical of political factions that deride minorities in general and are not representative of Turks.

"This always happens with 'firsts,'" she said. "If he were anything other than a Sunni Muslim male – a woman, even –these media would attack."

Going by his Facebook fan page, Bonomo has a solid following among Turks of all stripes. The video of the Aksam interview drew hundreds of comments supporting him. One fan, Osman Kural, denounced the "radical, right wing agitprop," and said it "in no way represents all of the country."

Bonomo, 24, oozes hip, with his retro caps and his blazer over T-shirt look. His Twitter biography describes him as "musician/illustrator/writer/drunk/bast'E'rd. (– Chill dude)." (His facility with English is another factor riling Turkish ultranationalists.)

EuroVisionary, a Eurovision fan site, describes the singer-songwriter's style as "Istanbulian music that works with tunes from Alaturca to international indie style." The Shins, Wax Poetic, the Kinks, the Libertines and the Beatles are listed by the site as his influences. His vocals incorporate the rising and falling quartertones typical of his country's music, and are set against throbbing drums and guitar and oud riffs.

Actor portrays general in Egoyan-directed play

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Daniel Kash plays a tormented general in Cruel and Tender, a play directed by Academy Award-nominated filmmaker Atom Egoyan, now running at the Bluma Appel Theatre.

Written by British playwright Martin Crimp, Cruel and Tender is based on Sophocles' ancient Greek tragedy Trachiniae (or The Women of Trachis). Sophocles' story focuses on Heracles, Greece's national hero, and what happened when he sent a captured princess home to his pining wife, while plundering the village of Euboas.

In Crimp's play, Kash plays Heracles, a modern-day military general fighting a war on terror in bloodstained Africa. His pampered wife, Amelia, waits at home, unaware that her world is about to be shattered with the arrival of Laela, a young African woman for whom her husband has committed unspeakable atrocities.

"In our production, the general is famous for achieving success, security and peace on behalf of his non-aggressive home country," Kash says. "My purpose was to fight terror in the world, but something has happened. While I'm away from home doing my duty, an incident has happened where I pulled the heart out of a young boy on a bus. Then, I went back to his hometown, levelled it and killed the guy who was running it, in order to get his daughter, Laela, who I am in love and in lust with.

"The politicians back home perceive that I have gone rogue and want to control me and show that I am a criminal now. So they have put my wife and her servants in a bunker outside of an airport in our home country. It is revealed to my wife that I am in love and in lust with Laela and she goes crazy about it."

Heracles's wife, Amelia, is played by Egoyan's real-life wife, the award-winning actor Arsinée Khanjian. Although he's directed her in several of his films, including Adoration, this is first time Egoyan will direct her on stage. He also previously directed Kash in the 1993 CBC film Gross Misconduct, about the late hockey player Brian (Spinner) Spencer.

Kash says that when directing a play, Egoyan has a chance to express his ideas of the themes in a symbolic version using stagecraft, and thinks Egoyan likes the intellectual literary aspect of theatre.

Kash is the father of two sons, Mackenzie, 10, and Tyson, 13, with his actor wife, Hayley Tyson. She's not Jewish, but Kash was raised in a Reform Jewish home and recently commemorated his oldest son's 13th birthday with what he calls a "fauxmitzvah."

Although Kash, the son of the late conductor Eugene Kash and the late opera singer Maureen Forrester, is musical himself, he decided to pursue acting instead. His career spans two decades, and he's graced the stages of CanStage, the Stratford Festival, Tarragon Theatre, Edmonton's Citadel and the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre. His film and television appearances include Alphas, Casino Jack, Skins, The Line, Aliens, On the Road and Fugitive Pieces, in addition to Gross Misconduct. Kash has had two Gemini nominations for best actor.

"From a cultural point of view, I grew up with volatile Jewish characters – including my father. It gave me a lot of emotional freedom without restraint," states Kash. "Also, the Jewish population is devoted to literature, philosophy and to seeking out knowledge, and that is a huge help to an actor. It makes sense."

Cruel and Tender runs until Feb. 18 at the Bluma Appel Theatre at Toronto's St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts. Tickets at www.canadianstage.com, 416-368-3110, or at the box office.

Allied airmen and their ordeal in Buchenwald

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

In the summer of 1944, a group of Allied airmen were captured in Paris after they bailed out of their burning planes. Treated as saboteurs by the Germans, they were sent to the Buchenwald concentration camp where only after the intervention of Luftwaffe officers were they transferred to a PoW camp.

Their story comes to light in the newly released documentary Lost Airmen of Buchenwald, now available on DVD.

Ed Carter-Edwards, a Canadian, is one of them. He was a wireless operator and gunner on a Halifax MKIII bomber.

Like the other downed airmen, he sought out members of the resistance to help hide him and spirit him out of the country.

The biggest risk for the airmen was not the Germans but other civilians who may turn them in. Carter-Edwards, and around 170 others, were betrayed by a Belgian double agent who turned them over to the Gestapo.

"Once you fall into the hands of the Gestapo or the SS, it's game over," Carter-Edwards says in the film. He is one of several survivors interviewed in this documentary.

Ed Carter-Edwards was a gunner on a Halifax MKIII bomber.

For some unknown reason, which the narrator says may have been deliberate or a clerical error, the airmen were not registered as regular prisoners of war but as saboteurs. Instead of being sent to a PoW camp, they were sent to a Gestapo-run prison outside Paris where they were tortured and kept in horrible conditions.

After D-Day, as the Allies approached Paris, they were crammed into box cars and transferred to Buchenwald over four to five hot August days. Although they were thrown in with other prisoners, mostly political undesirables or Russian PoWs, they continued to act like a military unit and followed military discipline

Under the orders of an officer among them from New Zealand who had the highest rank, the airmen defiantly refused to perform forced labour, insisting it was against the Geneva Conventions.

At Buchenwald they were starved and tortured. By chance, visiting Luftwaffe officers found out about them and insisted that they be transferred to a PoW camp.

They were finally transferred to Stalag Luft III, the site of an earlier breakout immortalized in the movie The Great Escape.

The difference between Buchenwald and the PoW camp was the difference between night and day. There, the airmen were allowed to receive and send letters home and eat Red Cross rations.

Theirs is an unusual story that deserves to be told, though it's not entirely unique. There is a documented case of about 350 American prisoners, mostly Jewish, who were sent to a labour camp.

It is unfortunate that Lost Airmen of Buchenwald hasn't been aired on television and is only available from the distributors at www.lostairmen.com.

Spiegelman wins Jewish Book Award

JTA

Author and illustrator Art Spiegelman and Israeli novelist Aharon Appelfeld are among the winners of the 2011 National Jewish Book Awards, an American presentation handed out annually by the Jewish Book Council.

Spiegelman's new book, MetaMaus: A Look Inside a Modern Classic, Maus, took the prize in the biography, autobiography and memoir category. The judges describe it "as brilliant and paradigm-shattering as...Maus... a work of genius."

Appelfeld won his third National Jewish Book Award in fiction for Until the Dawn's Light. Ned Beauman, the 26-year-old author of Boxer, Beetle, won in the outstanding debut fiction category.

Simon Sebag Montefiore was honoured with the Everett Family Foundation Jewish Book of the Year Award for his epic history, Jerusalem: The Biography.

This year, the Jewish Book Council will recognize the contributions of board member Myra H. Kraft, who died in July. The Myra H. Kraft Memorial Award in contemporary Jewish life and practice, endowed by her husband, Robert Kraft, and her family, has been established for her dedication to the world of Jewish literature. It will be presented to Rabbi David A. Teutsch for his book A Guide to Jewish Practice: Everyday Living.

Other winners include Hirsch Goodman in the history category for The Anatomy of Israel's Survival; Julie Chibbaro in the children's and young adult literature category for Deadly, and Dr. Tamara Cohn Eskenazi and Dr. Tikva Frymer-Kensky in the women's studies category for The JPS Bible Commentary: Ruth.

The awards will be presented March 14 in New York. A complete list of the winners can be seen at www.jewishbookcouncil.org . The Jewish Book Council has been giving out the National Jewish Book Awards since 1948.

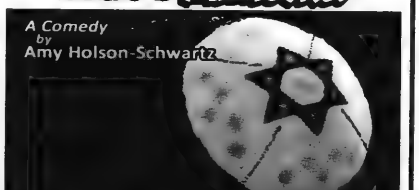
PRESENTS
at the Toronto Centre for the Arts (formerly The Ford Centre)
Can I really date a guy who wears a YARMULKE?



Eleanor, just back from a disastrous Birthright trip and a broken relationship, is thrust into a new relationship with Aaron. He's a doctor, he's got the brains, the looks, the wit... but wait! He's got a serious case of Zionism and an affinity to religion. Can Eleanor, whose secular brand of Judaism might include the occasional latke see past his yarmulke to find her true love?

Featuring: Jada Rifkin, Adrianna Prosser, Jesse Nerenberg* Scott Leaver*, Reva Lawry*, and Ron Boyd
*by special arrangement with Canadian Actors' Equity Association

Canadians earn medals at Pan Am Maccabi Games

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The medal count was good – four silvers and two bronze – but they tell only half the story of the recently concluded Pan American Maccabi Games, says Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher.

The best part of the recently concluded games in addition to the intense competition, was the camaraderie, the all-for-one-and-one-for–all attitude of the participants, and the pride in participating in a unique event that brought together Jews from around the world, he said.

Bacher was gushing as he recounted the Canadian team's experience in Sao Paulo, Brazil, where they joined 2,000 athletes from 16 countries at the games, held Dec. 26 to Jan. 2.

It started with the opening ceremonies in which the Canadian team was joined by family members, Maccabi officials and staff.

The march-in "creates pride in being Jewish, of being part of this worldwide organization," he said. "It was an amazing group of people who came together for the common good."

The Pan Am Maccabi is one of several regional games that take place every four years between Maccabiahs in Israel. The next Maccabiah is scheduled for the summer of 2013.

The smaller Pan Am Maccabi attracted athletes from Canada, Brazil, The United States, Australia, Israel, South Africa, Argentina, Venezuela, Chile, Panama and other countries.

Bacher, who was a member of past Canadian teams in Israel, was able to play a few innings for the silver-medal winning master's softball team in Sao Paulo. As president, however, his duties took him to various venues to cheer on the Canadian athletes, and one competition in particular has him effusive.

It was the basketball semifinal, one in which the 0-3 Canadians tipped off against Brazil. Despite the latter's home-court advantage, there were more than 100 Canadian spectators at the event, and they made lots of noise, Bacher recalled.

Down by 10 going into the fourth quarter, the boisterous Canadians helped rally the team, which mounted an improbable comeback to win by four points.

"The crowd was rocking," Bacher said. "They were screaming their heads off. It was the most fun I've ever had at a sporting event."

Canadian athletes and fans went from competition to competition to cheer their countrymen. Altogether, Maccabi Canada was represented by 90 coaches and athletes – four basketball teams (men's masters (over 35), men's open, under-19 and under-17), two softball teams (master's and open), one open soccer team and one table tennis player, Mitchell Billinkoff. The Winnipegger came home with one silver medal and two bronze medals.

The master's basketball team won silver, as did the open hoops squad, while the other two teams lost in the bronze medal games. The open softball team also finished second, while the soccer teams were competitive against soccer-mad countries, but came away with no medals.

Despite the lack of soccer medals, Bacher is optimistic that with a complete lineup of its best players, the team can challenge for a medal in Israel next year.

The same holds true for basketball. He's expected three or four top players who were unavailable in Brazil to bolster the Canadian team in Israel.

Preparations are already under way for the 2013 Games. Maccabi Canada is relying on its contacts in the sporting world to identify accomplished athletes, and in February, the organization will begin holding open tryouts for a variety of teams and sports.

One of the sports Canadians are expected to medal in is hockey. The sport was added to the 2013 Games for its first appearance since 1997, when Team Canada won gold. Teams from Canada, the United States, France and Israel are expected to compete. Russia may yet make it a five-country tournament, Bacher said.

Maccabiah organizers are considering three divisions – the open, which will bring together the best players of all ages, a master's division and an under-19 grouping.

It's not yet clear if the master's competition will be considered a medal sport or a demonstration event. If it's the latter, Canada might well send two teams, Bacher said.

Overall, Macçabi Canada might have as many as 450 athletes and staff at the 2013 Games. Plans are to bring the entire contingent to Israel for a five-day pre-competition mini-camp that will build team unity and allow for sightseeing as well as volunteer work.

Maccabi Canada sent Masters and Open softball teams to the Pan American Maccabi Games. The Open team won a silver medal. [Maccabi Canada photo]

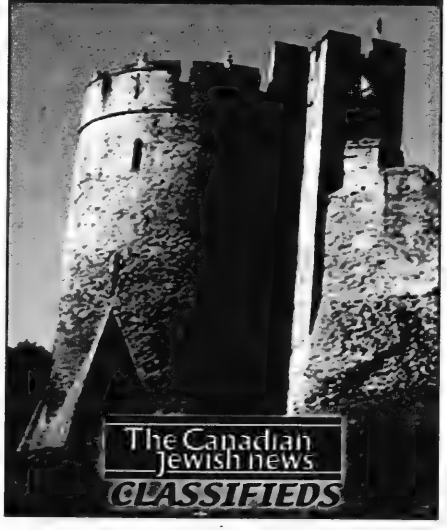
Need a Housekeeper?



Israeli activists seek to help Bedouins

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Amal Elsana Alh'jooj and Vivian Silver come from radically different backgrounds.

Silver grew up in a Zionist home in Winnipeg's nurturing Jewish community, while as a girl growing up in a strongly patriarchal Bedouin community in the Negev and as an Arab living in Israel, Alh'jooj's early life was doubly disadvantaged.

But both have been a major force for change in their communities. Ha'aretz named Silver one of Israel's 10 most influential Anglo-Israelis, and Alh'jooj was nominated for a Nobel Peace prize in 2005. Working together as co-directors of the Negev Institute for Strategies of Peace and Development (NISPED), they're playing a vital role in improving the lives of Bedouins in southern Israel.

On Jan. 17, Alh'jooj and Silver were in Winnipeg to take part in Gray Academy of Jewish Education's annual Raoul Wallenberg Day program. In the evening, they spoke about NISPED and its programs at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in a joint Shaarey Zedek-Congregation Etz'Chayim program.

Alh'jooj and Silver co-founded NISPED in 1998 and its Arab-Jewish Center for Equality, Empowerment and Co-operation (AJEEC) in 2000.

"A democracy is measured by how the majority treats the minority," Silver said in her evening presentation. "Israel's Declaration of Independence guaranteed complete equality for all of its citizens, no matter their race or religion."

Silver stressed that she and Alh'jooj are focused on bettering the lives of Israeli Arabs. "We are not here to talk about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," she said.

She noted that Arabs make up about 20 per cent of Israel's population, but the proportion in the Negev is higher – about 30 per cent, and largely Bedouin. "One can live one's life in Israel as a Jew without having any meaningful interaction with any Arabs," she said. "You can live with blinders on in regard to Israel's Arab population. Amal [Alh'jooj] helped me remove my blinders. She showed me what I was missing and has given me a slightly different view of Israeli Arabs."

Alh'jooj recalled growing up in Israel and never having any positive interactions with Israeli Jews. It wasn't until she came to Canada to attend McGill University in the late 1980s that she was befriended by a Jewish family. "That changed my view of Israel," she said.

Alh'jooj highlighted the uphill battle facing Negev Bedouins. "We tend to be invisible," she said.

Most Bedouins live in unrecognized villages whose houses can be torn down by the government on short notice, she said. Eighty per cent of children admitted to Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva are Bedouins, while just one per cent of students at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev are Bedouins. The unemployment rate among Bedouins is very high. And while there are schools in unrecognized villages for the burgeoning number of Bedouin children, there are few after-school programs to further their education and keep them off the street.

"For 22 years, I have been fighting for justice and equality for my people," Alh'jooj says. "Progress has been glacial. Although many Israelis view the Bedouin as a demographic and security threat, it is not so much discrimination as ignorance that we are dealing with. We find that government ministers are often willing to change policies and help us once we make them aware of our situation."

AJEEC's activities focus mainly on the Negev's Bedouin community – some 180,000 people – because its needs and challenges are more acute than other sectors of the Arab-Israeli population.

Alh'jooj outlined NISPED's and AJEEC's many programs, including the Arab-Bedouin Volunteer Tent, the Arab Jewish Volunteer Gap-Year Program, the Negev Belongs to Us All partnership program, and the Women and Infants Health Promotion Project.

"One of our flagship projects is the single women's catering kitchen in Hura, one of the seven recognized Bedouin villages in the Negev," Silver told The CJN in an interview. "This enterprise empowers and provides opportunities for Arab Bedouin single mothers [abandoned as a result of polygamous marriages] to support their families with dignity. It also meets the food security needs of Arab Bedouin school children in the village of Hura."

Thirteen women trained in large-scale cooking now produce 3,000 lunches a day for children in Hura as part of the government's hot lunch program, Silver said.

Silver and Alh'jooj were also slated to speak in Los Angeles, Washington and New York on a tour sponsored by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Power siblings work and play together

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

For most siblings, the idea of working together can be a bit scary, but for Shane and Jessica Fenton, it's just another day at the office.

"I can admit that I love working with my brother," said Jessica.

"But she didn't love walking to high school with me when she was in Grade 11 and I was in Grade 9," Shane added with a laugh.

Shane, 28, and his older sister Jessica, 30, have taken their spots at the helm of their father's real estate development company, Reserve Properties. Shane is the vice-president, and Jessica is the senior manager of marketing and client relations.

The sibling duo were primed to make their mark on the family business since they could walk and talk. "We were at our first groundbreaking when I was four and Jessica was six," said Shane, adding that the development business has become "second nature" after so many years.

Shane joined Reserve Properties immediately after graduating from the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of Business six years ago. Jessica, who joined about a year ago, after completing an MBA at Ryerson University's Ted Rogers School of Management, said that although she didn't hop on board as quickly as her brother, she "always knew that [she] wanted to get into the business."

Their fourth condominium launch of 2011 was a complex that will be built near their childhood neighbourhood of Spadina Avenue and St. Clair Avenue West in Toronto. The Rise Condominium project, like most of those that they work on, is geared toward young urban professionals, a demographic that the Fenton siblings relate to well. Jessica explained that it's like building spaces where they and their friends would want to live.

When Shane and Jessica tackle a development project together, they are careful to play to their respective strengths, which helps them avoid any kind of sibling rivalry.

"Jessica is more the detail and I'm more the bigger picture," said Shane, explaining that Jessica, who has a background in fashion, will often help with interior decorating choices. "I love the creative aspect," said Jessica, adding that for the moment, her esthetic of choice is a "contemporary hotel" look.

"Just like fashion, the design element of real estate is always changing as well," she said.

In keeping with his "bigger picture" preference, Shane finds his passion in scouting out possible building sites. Often, he will ride his bike around the city, getting a feel for the best places to start new development projects.

"When you're driving around, you fly by too quick. When you're biking, you get a different sense," he said.

Understanding development on a human scale helps Shane build a connection with the project at hand. It's the connection to the work and the enthusiasm that help him and his sister overcome any blips in the construction process.

"You kind of have to get used to getting good news and bad news multiple times throughout the day and plug on," said Shane. "It's something that's a passion and a hobby more than just a career," he added, explaining that loving what you do makes the challenges more fun.

The Fentons found that they work through challenges together very well, and they carry over their working relationship into philanthropic endeavours and community involvement, which they are both passionate about.

Both siblings are actively involved with the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, as well as various UJA Federation of Greater Toronto initiatives in the young adult community. Jessica is also a co-chair of the Jewish National Fund's young leadership board called JNF Future. She especially enjoys the event planning aspects of Jewish community work and is part of the committee planning the UJA's Together party.

According to Jessica, her and Shane's parents encouraged them to reach out to the Jewish community from a very young age.

"The one thing that they always said was that they wanted us to give back to the community," said Jessica. Though her work schedule is hectic, she said she has no problem finding time for charity projects. "I enjoy it so much that I don't feel like I have to squeeze it in," she said.

Shane feels that the Jewish ethics and principles that their parents and grandparents instilled in them of tzedakah and community involvement don't just affect their philanthropic work, but also their day-to-day lives.

"A lot of who we are as people ties into what our values and traditions were through Judaism," he said.

Another important part of the siblings' Jewish upbringing was the emphasis on Israel.

"I'm incredibly passionate about Israel. Israel has always been important to my family," said Jessica. She added that she and her brother often take summer vacations to the Holy Land, where they especially enjoy soaking up the sun on Tel Aviv's beaches. "We love the culture and the people – just the vibe," she said.

Spending time together on vacation, at work and in their philanthropic projects, one might think the Fenton siblings would start to get sick of each other, but they're showing no signs of sibling rivalry.

Shane jokes that as kids, they were "enough for [their] parents to handle," but as adults, their close-knit relationship is one any parent would be proud of. "As we got older, we started to realize how much we have in common. Not only as brother and sister – we're great friends."

"אז מה את מאחלת לעצמך לשנה האזרחית החדשה?" מבררת טלי, בעודה מסמסת בזריזות טקסטים בלקברי המצועצע שלה. "אני מאחלת לעצמי חברה שמקשיבה לי, ולא מקלידה מאמרי מערכת מעמיקים תוך כדי הצגת שאלות מהותיות בחיי אדם." אני עונה. בתום כחצי שעה, טלי מפסיקה, לוגמת קפה ומביטה בי. אני: הרי את לא באמת שואלת אותי, כי מעניינים אותך מאווי ותיקוותי, את שואלת אותי כדי שתהנהני מבלי להקשיב, תחכי כבר שאסיים ואשאל אותך אותה שאלה, ואז תתחילי לדבר על עצמך.

טלי: הגזמת. דווקא את מאוד מעניינת אותי. תמיד. בטח האיחול הראשון שלך לעצמך זה להצליח השנה, לשם שינוי, בדיאטה.

טלי: לא, כי כל אשה מאחלת את זה לעצמה בינואר. כל אשה. גם דוגמנית.

אני: אז לידיעתך, אני לא כזו שיטחית. אני דווקא מאחלת לעצמי שהשיער סוף סוף יסתדר לי השנה, ואולי גם אלך על סילסול פרמננט, או על קצוץ שובבי ודי.

טלי: עמוק, ידידתי, עמוק. אני מאחלת לעצמי להפסיק לפחד. אני פוחדת באמת להתחיל לחיות. כאילו שכל מה שהיה עד עכשיו? זה רק חזרה כללית.

אני: עמוק, ידידתי, עמוק. אני פוחדת רק משלושה דברים: רוצחים, נחשים ואחותו של בעלי. לאו דווקא בסדר הזה.

טלי: אני פוחדת מאנסים, מעוני ומאורחים ששכחו את השעון שלהם בבית.

אני: מזדהה! אבל למה עוני? יש משהו שאת לא מספרת לי?

טלי: שום דבר. פשוט הייתי רוצה שהשנה יהיה לי סוף סוף קצת כסף מיותר. אין לי מושג איך להגשים את זה. שוברת את הראש. חידה.

אני: אולי, ככה סתם אני זורקת רעיון מהפכני לאוויר, אולי תחפשי עבודה?

טלי: השתגעת? אני בחיים לא מסתדרת עם בוסים. הבוס האחרון שהיה לי, יחסינו התבססו על המשפט 'כבדהו וחשדהו': הוא כיבד אותי, ואני חשדתי בו.

אני: כשאני מדמיינת אותך במשרד, אני רואה אותך יושבת רגל על רגל, ספל קפוצ'ינו ביד אחת ומגזין 'אין- טאי' בשנייה, בעוד הבוס שלך מביט בך בצער.

טלי: אז את טועה לחלוטין. אני קוראת מעכשיו רק את המגזין 'אין- סטיילי'...

אני: טוב, אני לעומתך, מאחלת לעצמי בדיוק את מה שיש לי כרגע, רק אולי שמאיר יפסיק לרדת עלי בנושא, איך נקרא לזה, תחזוקת הבית.

טלי: מה עכשיו? הוא מלמד אותך איך להיצמד למעקה כשאת עולה במדרגות כדי שלא תלכלכי את הקיר שמנגד?

אני: לא, עברנו את זה. כרגע אנחנו בשיאו של שיעור מאלף: מאיר מראה לי איך לפסוע בפיסוק רחב על שטיחי המסדרון, כדי שהחלק האמצעי לא יתבלה...

טלי: איך את חיה איתו, אני לא מבינה. מצד שני, הוא גבר נהדר. חולה עלייך.

אני: צודקת. הוא באמת חולה עלי. את יודעת, את תמיד בתכ'לס מבינה אותי. בניגוד לתחילת שיחתינו, לפחות חברה טובה וקשובה, זה כבר יש לי השנה.

טלי: מיי? תכירי לי אותה. אני גם מתה לחברה כזו. כן, זה מה שאני מאחלת לעצמי השנה: למצוא לי סוף סוף חברה טובה וקשובה...

SPICY TURKEY BURGERS

1 1/4 lbs lean ground turkey
1 c mild salsa, divided
1/2 c finely chopped shallots
1/4 c chopped fresh cilantro
4 tbls vegetable oil, divided
1 tblsp hot sauce
1 tsp ground cumin
1 tsp salt
1/2 tsp ground black pepper

Mix ground turkey, 1/2 c salsa, shallots, cilantro, 3 tblsps oil, hot sauce, cumin, salt, pepper in large bowl. If mixture is too loose, add bread crumbs until mixture is firm enough to shape into four 3 ½" patties.

Heat 1 tblsp oil in large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Add burgers; cook until brown, about 3 min. per side. Reduce heat to low. Sauté until burgers are cooked through, about 4 min., turning occasionally.

International Holocaust Day: The State of Israel should do some soul-searching.

He was a shepherd

Kibur Asres died last month at 61 in Bahir Dar, Ethiopia, and was buried in Addis Ababa. Thousands cried for him, Jewish and non-Jewish. We, in Toronto, were honoured to have known him.

Kibur was born on May 12, 1950, in Dabat, Ethiopia, to Qes Asres Yayehe and Amarach Denku. He was known to his close family as Wondemalem, translated as "my dearest brother." According to his daughter, Beth, he was a wise, kind, generous, courageous and complex man.

Like many great leaders in training, Kibur spent his early years tending sheep. In the 1960s, he graduated, with honours, from Addis Ababa University with a degree in chemistry and mathematics and received his diploma from former Ethiopian emperor Haile Selassie.

Kibur spent the next eight years working as a professor. While teaching at Bahir Dar University, he met the lovely and gentle Walelign Fanta. They had three children, Joseph, Eyassu and Bethlehem (Beth).

In 1983, following the Ethiopian revolution and with a bounty on his head, Kibur and family fled to Montreal with the help of JIAS. They were among the first Beta Israel families to leave Ethiopia and arrive in Canada. He completed a master's degree in social work at McGill University, while he continued working as a chemist and researcher for the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, specializing in AIDS research.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Later, the family moved to Toronto and Kibur worked as a social worker with Jewish Family & Child. He was the president of the Toronto Ethiopian Association, and created a very successful parking-lot management enterprise called Globe Park Ltd. Kibur was also the dean of the Ottawa School of Business.

His true passion in life was community service. "Any person who had the opportunity to know him can attest to his genuine passion to improve the lives of all those he encountered," Beth said.

Kibur was the founder of Horn Refugee Foundation, which assisted more than 3,000 African refugee claimants. He established the Re-Med Foundation, which provided medical supplies to underprivileged people internationally. He also created the Addis Hope Foundation, which assisted in community development in Ethiopia.

Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. said, "I submit to you that if a man has not discovered something that he will die for, he isn't fit to live." This was not the case with Kibur Asres. He helped dozens of Ethiopian Jews immigrate to Canada. He was an executive member of the Canadian Jewish Congress and served on its race relations committee. He travelled to Israel in 2000 on an exclusive trip for the national executive of the CJC. While there, he spoke with then-prime minister Ehud Barak about the plight of the Falash Mora.

Kibur was quoted saying, "Apart from the fact that not enough is being done to bring them to Israel, not enough is being done simply to keep them alive. They have so many relatives here [in Israel] and are going to come at some point, so why extend their pain and suffering."

He is survived by his grandchildren, Rebecca, Abigail and Matthew; his siblings, Etzuvdink, Sara, Kokobie, Mulualem, Mintiwab, Addisalem and Paulos, and many nieces, nephews, cousins and lots of people he saved.

Kibur was a kind of Ethiopian royalty, in his own unique way. More than 1,000 people came to his shivah in Israel, and hundreds more in Toronto. He died young and was very fit to live. Zochreinu livrachah.

Canadian cabinet ministers in Israel

Turkey may give Hamas $300M in aid

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ISTANBUL — Turkey may provide Hamas with $300 million in annual aid, Turkish sources report. The aid would replace Iranian funding, which has been significantly reduced.

Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh reportedly received assurances about the proposed funding during his recent visit to Turkey.

Haniyeh was warmly received last month by Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and was cheered when he visited the Turkish parliament. Turkey supports reconciliation between Fatah and Hamas, and Turkish sources report that the Erdogan government has promised to aid the reconciliation process.

According to Turkish sources, Haniyeh laid out in detail for Erdogan the financial difficulties that Hamas is currently facing, after payments from Iran, which had totalled $250 to $300 million annually, did not arrive on time and were cut significantly. This led to Hamas not being able to pay its employees' salaries.

The same sources reported that Hamas chief Khaled Meshal has left Syria for good and is considering putting the organization's headquarters in Qatar or Jordan.

CIJA Starts Council

VANCOUVER — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver have set up a local advocacy council as part of the national reorganization of Jewish advocacy groups last summer that saw CIJA replace Canadian Jewish Congress and other groups.

the organizations said last week. Paul Goldman and Stephen Schachter will co-chair the new council, which will represent the federation and CIJA on local and national advocacy issues and ensure that local perspectives are reflected in national decision-making. As well, CIJA announced that Darren Mackoff, a former American Israel Public Affairs Committee spokesperson, is its new Pacific region director.

Jews Meet Cardinal

TORONTO — A delegation from B'nai Brith Canada met last week with Cardinal-Elect Thomas Collins to congratulate him on his elevation by the Vatican and discuss issues of mutual concern to faith communities in Canada. The meeting with the current Archbishop of Toronto aimed to lay the groundwork for future meetings, express concern about the plight of Christians who face persecution and convey "our hope for religious tolerance for all people of faith," said B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant.

Plot Uncovered

BAKU — At least two citizens of Azerbaijan reportedly were arrested in connection with an alleged plot to kill two Jewish educators and the Israeli ambassador in Baku. The arrests last month were reported in local media in the Azerbaijani capital. Three men were charged with weapons smuggling as part of a plot to kill a teacher and a rabbi at the Chabad Or Avner Jewish school in Baku, as well as the Israeli ambassador to Azerbaijan, Michael Lotem. Two of those charged are reported to be in custody. One is still at large. It's alleged that Iranian intelligence agencies promised to pay the three men $150,000 to commit the murders. Approximately 6,400 Jews live in Azerbaijan. The Or Avner school opened in 2010. It has about 400 students.

Demjanjuk Seeks State Funds To Sue Paper

John Demjanjuk

BERLIN — Convicted Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk has asked Germany to provide funds for his lawsuit against the online edition of the German tabloid newspaper Bild.

Demjanjuk wants some $33,000 to sue Bild for its allegedly "derogatory and prejudiced" reporting on his trial, which ended last May with his conviction as an accomplice in the murders of 28,060 in the Nazi death camp Sobibor during World War II.

According to the German news agency DPA, Demjanjuk, 91, is suing the tabloid over its use during the trial of such terms as "war criminal," "beast of the concentration camp" and "Nazi henchman." The implication is that Bild.de, the online version of Germany's most widely read daily paper, influenced the outcome of the trial.

The German Press Council reportedly chastised Bild.de over its reporting on the trial, but according to the Demjanjuk complaint as reported by DPA, the tabloid continued to use "lurid" language and failed to uphold the principle of innocence until proven guilty. Bild.de has maintained that its reporting was appropriate.

Demjanjuk, who is in an old-age home pending an appeal of his conviction and five-year jail sentence, reportedly has no money. His efforts to regain U.S. citizenship have been rebuffed by a Cleveland judge.

Population Stable

CLEVELAND — A new population study of the Cleveland area found the Jewish population has stayed relatively stable over the last 15 years. The study, the first since 1996, found 80,800 Jews living in the greater Cleveland area, down slightly from 81,500 in 1996.

TSO maestro to guest conduct in Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra will add a Canadian twist later this month when Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) musical director Peter Oundjian begins a two-week guest-conducting stint on Feb. 14.

Oundjian, 56, said he is "extremely excited" to work with the Israeli orchestra and that it will mark "a major moment" in his career. This will be his second visit to Israel. His last trip was in 1987 when he was principal violinist with the Tokyo String Quartet.

In an interview with The CJN at a Yorkville café late last month, an affable Oundjian spoke about numerous topics, including his great admiration for renowned Israel Philharmonic musical-director-for-life Zubin Mehta; being mentored by legendary soloist Itzhak Perlman while studying violin at Julliard; and his deep friendship with conductor Pinchas Zukerman, whom he refers to as his "big brother."

All these factors have made Oundjian eager to conduct the Israel Philharmonic, which he termed "one of the world's greatest and most passionate orchestras."

He's also looking forward to conducting in front of an Israeli crowd.

Oundjian said while he normally avoids making too grand a statement about any audience in any city or country, "there was something so extraordinary" about playing in Israel in 1987. "There was an intensity to the way people listened and an adoration of the music and a respectful commitment to it that was just inspiring."

With that in mind, he said he has decided on a play list for the Israel Philharmonic that he hopes will be more challenging for both the musicians and the audience in Israel.

There will be six pieces played under Oundjian's baton: Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 and Symphonic Dances; Ravel's Alborada del gracioso; Sibelius' Finlandia; Stravinsky's Firebird Suite; and Canadian composer Gary Kulesha's Torque. Oundjian said he chose pieces he felt passionate about, adding that Symphonic Dances is about the "journey of man from primal being. It's deeply felt and supremely spiritual in its final moments.

The Legend Lives On

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

"They thought of everything."

Our call to arms

From the editor's desk...

As of this writing, it is not certain whether the Jordanian-mediated, low-level, preliminary talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) will resume.

Palestinians say they will decide upon their course of action later this week. Israelis urge the Palestinians "to come their senses." The diplomats of the Quartet (European Union, United States, United Nations and Russia) plead for the sides to keep meeting.

Given the impossible preconditions that the PA has imposed on the Israelis for resuming negotiations, the Amman meetings seem to have simply been part of the elaborate plan by the PA to continue to strive to achieve indirectly – namely, through the intervention of the international community – what they do not wish to achieve directly – i.e., through face-to-face bargaining and compromise with Israel.

The Amman talks, therefore, were programmed for failure by the PA.

Indeed, failure in Amman will be the stepping stone for the next phase of the Palestinians' campaign against Israel.

The nature of that campaign was already spelled out at the start of the new year, by prominent PA member Nabil Sha'ath in a little-noticed story published by Ha'aretz, citing sources in Israel's foreign ministry.

The year 2012 "will be the start of an unprecedented diplomatic campaign on the part of the Palestinian leadership, and it will be a year of pressure on Israel that will put it under a real international siege. The campaign will be similar to the one waged against apartheid in South Africa," Sha'ath said.

According to the story, the campaign comprises a number of diplomatic-legal fronts, including:

• Asking the Security Council to condemn settlement construction and impose international sanctions on Israel.

• Bringing a request to the International Criminal Court in The Hague that it try Israel for war crimes arising from the 2009 war in Gaza.

• Encouraging individual Palestinians to seek war-related damages against Israel in western courts.

• Urging the Swiss government to convene a meeting of the signatories to the Geneva Convention to debate the applicability of the document to Israeli conduct in the West Bank.

• Pressuring the UN General Assembly or the UN Human Rights Council to send a fact-finding committee to the West Bank.

• Renewing efforts to secure full-membership status for Palestine, and

• Organizing mass rallies against Israel in the West Bank and Gaza and even possibly along Israel's border with its other neighbours.

The tripwire for the launch of the campaign will be the unhappy pronouncement by the PA delivered suitably in sombre tones of indignation and disappointment that the Quartet's Amman-based initiative is dead.

The PA spokesperson will look directly into the camera, an expertly rehearsed blend of pain and anger anchoring the sorrow of his expression, and remind reporters that PA President Mahmoud Abbas had expressly said at the start of the year that if the Quartet was incapable of bringing Israel to the table, "all options will be open."

And now we know what some of those options are.

Israel's security establishment too recently warned that the diplomatic-legal campaign against the Jewish state will soon be renewed and reinvigorated.

The Meir Amit Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center last month reported that its analysts have concluded that the numerous networks around the world of anti-Israel, human rights, NGO, social activist, anti-imperialist, advocacy groups are planning a "number of propaganda events for the upcoming months."

The most prominent of the events will be the Global March to Jerusalem comprising a series of "marches originating in the Arab states bordering Israel and possibly also from the Palestinian Authority to be held on or around Israeli Arab 'Land Day' on March 30, a protest fly-in to Ben-Gurion International Airport April 15, a week after Easter, and the Israeli Apartheid Week activities in various western countries in February and March."

According to the report there are also new plans to try once again to reach the Gaza Strip by sea with a large flotilla or with individual boats to break Israel's naval blockade of the place.

In their scheme, the Palestinians constantly portray themselves as the single-most aggrieved community on earth, feign a desire to negotiate with the Jewish state and recoil with disgust at Israel's leaders failure to accede to Palestinian demands.

In most parts of the western world, their scheme, alas, has been successful. Israel is seen as the recalcitrant party and the Palestinians as the long-suffering oppressed and wounded.

As they readily gloat, the Palestinians are now primed to put Israel further under "international siege." But they will not be unopposed in this battle.

Their smug boasting is our own call to arms. And we must respond.

Rabbi leads Knesset's first egalitarian minyan

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Last Tuesday, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, executive director of Mercaz-Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism, led what was described as the first mixed-gender prayer service in the chapel of the Knesset building in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Gorman was the only Canadian on a four-day mission of 21 Conservative and rabbinic and lay leaders from North America. Mercaz-Canada is the Conservative movement's Zionist organization, and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism supports the work of Israel's Masorti movement, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement.

The group, which was joined by counterparts from the Masorti movement in Israel, visited the Knesset to meet with Israeli lawmakers and discuss issues of religious pluralism and religious extremism in Israel. Following the meeting, the group held an afternoon service in the men's section of the Knesset synagogue, which traditionally holds only Orthodox worship services, according to Ynet.

The visitors were not "looking to make waves" with the prayer service, Rabbi Gorman told The CJN in a phone interview. Mission participants davened every day, and they asked if the chapel would be available during their Jan. 24 Knesset visit, she said.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, wearing a tam, led services in the chapel of Israel's Knesset last week.

The politicians "came out favourably in saying [the chapel] is a public space, even some from the far right," she said.

The group met with Dan Meridor, Israel's deputy prime minister, and MKs Uzi Landau (minister of energy and water resources), Yohanan Plesner, Isaac Herzog and Orit Zuaretz. Opposition leader Tzipi Livni, head of the Kadima party, spoke to participants at their opening dinner.

Rabbi Gorman is heartened that politicians want to speak to the Masorti group – "not just the Kadima party but from Labour and Likud and Yisrael Beitenu, so it's not just the people who agree with us.

"We want them to hear what we are looking for… We'd like to see the guarantees in law for pluralism, not just for Masorti. We'd like to see equal funding for different schools."

She's optimistic that change is on the way. "They're realizing Israelis want something more. Their constituents also want something that's a little different. There's a realization among many Israeli politicians that there needs to be more to Jewish identity than to live in Israel. As Orthodoxy moves further right, most Israelis aren't going there. That's significant."

She added: "We need people who identify as Israeli. If you move further right [religiously], you have people who don't identify as Israeli living in Israel."

Rabbi Gorman noted that the group was not suggesting that Masorti "is instead of Orthodoxy. We're saying this is in addition to Orthodoxy, so that your choice isn't [only] to send your child to an ultra-Orthodox school or a completely secular school.

"Many Israelis today don't know what it means to be Jewish. They just know what it means to be Israeli."

Rabbi Gorman, who was visiting Masorti sites for the first time since taking on her new position last year, said the movement has made "amazing strides" in Israel in recent years. In the past two years alone, she said, 10 new kehillot have been established

Federation works to solve Vaughan sign flap

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the city of Vaughan have been working together to address issues that arose over 48 UJA signs that violated city bylaws.

Vaughan and federation representatives met two weeks ago, and the federation is working to come up with a proposal for a new bylaw regarding temporary signage, Steven Shulman, the federation's campaign director and counsel, told The CJN.

The signs in question stated "Jewish Toronto Lives Here," and were also used in Toronto, where there has not been an issue about them, Shulman said.

He added that current talks represent the culmination of a "very positive" process that began several months ago.

Participants are taking into consideration "the need for community organizations and us in particular to get our message out, and at the same time take into consideration any concerns the city of Vaughan may have," Shulman said.

The city will not be charging federation for the signs, although according to a Nov. 19 article on yorkregion.com, Vaughan's bylaws specify that a $500 fee should be applied to each of the federation's 48 signs. If that were enforced, the federation would owe the city $24,000.

Shulman added that federation has changed the relevant signs so that they read, "Jewish Vaughan lives here" instead of "Jewish Toronto lives here."

Woodbridge West Coun. Tony Carella had taken exception to the wording of the signs, which Shulman said at the time referred to the GTA, not just the city of Toronto.

John Studdy, manager of customer service and administration for the city of Vaughan's building standards department, said concerns for the city include the number and location of signs, as well as public safety issues.

Vaughan council meets every three weeks. Federation's proposal is expected to be brought to council after it is completed some time this month, and once it has been vetted by the building standards department.

TSO maestro in Israel

"I suggested pieces I just love, that have a lot of contrast and would be, I thought, exciting to conduct with such a great orchestra. And I didn't want them to be something like Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, which they play all the time. I just didn't want to have [the musicians] say 'Oh no, not this again,'" he said.

Oundjian's Israel concert tour will be a gruelling one, with 10 concerts in a two-week schedule in Haifa, Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Regardless, he said he's also very excited at the opportunity to conduct pianist Yuja Wang, a 24-year-old Chinese prodigy he described as "phenomenal."

Originally a violinist, Oundjian had to give up the violin at age 39, when a wrist injury forced him to abandon it. Thankfully, he had also simultaneously studied conducting, and decided to dive into that art full time.

He was born in Toronto but moved to England at age five, "where I picked up this pretentious accent," he quipped. Despite living and travelling abroad most of his life, Oundjian said he'd always kept touch with his Toronto roots through family here, and jumped at the chance to direct and revitalize the TSO when the job was offered to him in 2004.

"I was approached by the TSO and was very excited about it, despite knowing that the orchestra had gone through some difficult times and needed a lot of work. But for me, that was like a calling. It was the most exciting thing [a conductor] can imagine doing, to bring back a once-great orchestra to a state of good and fine artistic health. I was totally dedicated to making it happen," he said.

As evidenced by his work breathing musical life back into the TSO and attracting new fans to the genre, Oundjian is at ease in both his role as conductor and as the de facto face of the orchestra, mostly because he's so unassuming and comes off as a man of the people.

Some little-known facts about Oundjian: His cousin is comedian Eric Idle of Monty Python fame. He grew up idolizing England's Chelsea soccer team – "I wanted to play for Chelsea. Chelsea didn't want me to play for them," he said wryly – but has become an avid hockey fan since returning to Canada. His nephew is Chicago Blackhawks rookie right-winger Ben Smith.

Oundjian said he also likes to take a break from classical music from time to time to listen to jazz and rock music, and his son keeps him informed about the latter.

"So I've developed a strong interest in [rock music]. I also grew up a huge Beatles and Pink Floyd fan."

He declined to discuss the Israel-Palestine peace process, but said he believes that music promotes peace.

"A lot of music deals with conflict. It examines it, unravels it and usually finds a way out of it with a joyful feeling of peace at the end. That's why I'm a musician, because I love to deal with harmony," he said.

Turkish diplomats saved Jews during Holocaust

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A little-known but uplifting and inspiring chapter in the annals of the Holocaust was unveiled last week with the screening of a film about the rescue of Jews in Nazi-occupied France by Turkish diplomats.

Turkish Passport, a 1-1/2 hour documentary with dramatic re-enactments, was presented by B'nai Brith Canada in conjunction with the Federation of Canadian Turkish Associations and the Turkish Society of Canada.

Gunes Celikcan

It was screened at B'nai Brith's national offices before a mixed Jewish-Turkish audience on Jan. 26, a day before International Holocaust Remembrance Day and the 67th anniversary of the Red Army's liberation of the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp.

Turkish Passport, already shown in 17 cities in Turkey and at the Cannes Film Festival, the Atlanta Jewish Film Festival and the Amsterdam Turkish Film Festival, among other festivals, turns on the efforts of Turkey's diplomats in occupied France to protect and save Sephardi Jews of Turkish origin or nationality.

The film, directed by Burak Arliel and produced by Gunes Celikcan, who personally introduced it, is based on historical data and on the testimonies of rescued Jews and the statements of the grown children of this brave band of diplomats.

"Turkish diplomacy saved my life," says one survivor, succinctly summing up the eternally grateful views of his fellow Jews to Turkey.

In feats of quiet and until recently unheralded heroism, Turkish diplomats stationed in France worked miracles.

They prevailed upon Nazi authorities to free Jews in the Drancy concentration camp. They plucked Jews from a train bound for a death camp. They persuaded the Nazis to exempt Jews from the panoply of antisemitic restrictions imposed upon the Jews of France.

Turkey, a neutral power that declared war on Nazi Germany late in World War II, also laid on eight special trains to transport some 2,000 Jews from Paris to Istanbul in 1944.

According to the late American researcher Arnold Beisman, Turkey saved a total of about 15,000 Jews in wartime France.

In comments prior to the screening, Turkey's consul general in Toronto, Ali Riza Guney, said Turkish Passport underscores the point that dark forces can be defeated by a combination of courage and humanity.

"Whoever saves one life, saves the entire world," he said, quoting the Talmud and the Qur'an.

The lengths to which Turkish diplomats went to help Jews was illustrative of "the historic bonds of friendship and solidarity between our peoples," he noted in an interview before last week's event.

Guney singled out two diplomats for praise.

"Necdet Kent, our consul in Marseille from 1941 to 1944, boarded a train full of Jews who were being sent to Auschwitz. He refused to leave unless they were released.

"Selahattin Ulkumen, our consul in Rhodes in 1943 and 1944, saved 42 Jewish families from deportation to concentration camps." In 1990, he added, Yad Vashem – the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem – declared him a Righteous Gentile.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, described the Turkish rescue effort as "a piece of history that's unknown."

Conveying a message from Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Mark Adler, member of Parliament for York Centre, called it "an untold story" and thanked the filmmaker for bringing it to the attention of Canadians.

Cenk Sayin, a member of the board of the Turkish Society of Canada, hailed Turkish Passport as a shining moment in Turkey's history of which Turks and 50,000 Turkish Canadians can be proud.

Celikcan, a filmmaker in his 30s, spent seven years researching and making the quasi-documentary movie, which was shot in France, Romania and Turkey and finished last year.

Celikcan said that Turkish diplomats, maintaining a self-effacing low profile, did not speak about their heroic deeds after the war. Kent, for example, claimed that humanitarian attitudes should not be rewarded.

Nonetheless, Turkish diplomats carved out a special niche for themselves during the Holocaust.

No dialogue, just worry

The complicated general elections for a new parliament in Egypt have finally been completed. The hybrid proportional and direct election system has yielded a result in which Islamists of various bents and inclinations won about two-thirds of the seats.

We do not yet know exactly how, but we do know that life for the "average individual" in the Middle East's largest country is about to change. And likely quite radically. The Islamist parties are committed to installing sharia law as the governing constitutional ethos of modern Egypt. The result may not be the sort of revolution envisioned by the Internet-driven pursuit of greater government accountability, individual liberty and personal freedoms by so many of the country's youths who inspired the Tahrir Square demonstrations a year ago.

In an extension of a friendly hand to its large neighbour to the south, Israel last week sent a congratulatory note to the people of Egypt after the inauguration of its new parliament.

"On the occasion of the opening session of the Egyptian parliament, on Jan. 23, Israel extends its congratulations to the people of Egypt for its efforts to achieve freedom, democracy and economic development," Israel's Foreign Affairs Ministry said.

"We send the new parliament our wishes of constructive and fruitful work for the well-being of the Egyptian public. We trust Egypt will continue to uphold the importance of peace and stability in our region," the foreign ministry statement added. The hopeful gesture was spurned.

Moreover and more ominously, so, too, was the possibility of any let alone civil, mutually respectful bilateral relations.

According to a report in JTA, a spokesperson for the Muslim Brotherhood said that the government of Egypt would not hold any kind of dialogue with Israel.

"The [Muslim Brotherhood] group does not have any willingness to engage in dialogue with Israel," Mahmoud Ghazlan told the London-based Arabic newspaper Asharq Alawsat in an interview. "This decision has been taken and our position is consistent and clear, and is not currently open to discussion."

Ghazlan left little doubt that diplomatic relations with the Jewish state are in jeopardy. Recent equivocal assurances by Brotherhood spokespeople that the peace treaty between the two countries, signed in 1979, will not be reopened provide no comfort. As many commentators have noted, the strong showing by the Islamist forces has unleashed a veritable hurricane of publicly conveyed anti-Jewish, anti-Israel expression. Writing recently in the Atlantic magazine, Jeffrey Goldberg observed that "Cairo is rife with antisemitism."

Even as former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak pleads with the new rulers that his life be spared, the rest of us watch and hope that peaceful relations, if not actual peace, will also be spared.

25 years ago in The CJN

The Ontario Court of Appeal overturned propagandist Ernst Zundel's conviction on charges of disseminating lies about the Holocaust because of errors during the trial and in charges to the jury, and ordered a new trial. But the court also ruled that the false news law Zundel was convicted under didn't violate freedom of expression guarantees in the Charter of Rights. The Crown said it might appeal.

Holocaust commemoration

Prime Minister Stephen Harper issued the following statement on Jan. 27 to mark the United Nations' annual International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust:

"On this solemn 67th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, the largest Nazi concentration camp, I join Canadians and the international community in commemorating the millions of men, women and children, who suffered, died and lost loved ones during one of the most heinous chapters in human history.

"Through indescribable atrocities, the fundamental and universal principles of freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law were desecrated during the Holocaust.

"As we mourn those who were murdered by the Nazis more than six decades ago and honour the legacy of those who survived, let us use the lessons of the past to remind us of the importance of tolerance, and inspire us to take a stand against hatred and discrimination, including antisemitism in all its forms.

"We must never allow the crimes of the past to be repeated or forgotten."

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

Indigent survivors

I was terribly troubled by the article "The indigent survivor: a global emergency" (Jan. 12), by Dov Harris, regarding the state of Holocaust survivors, one-third of whom live in poverty. I wish to act to try to improve this situation. However, in his excellent article, the writer has not explored how we might act. I wasn't aware of the survivors' shortfall and the difficulty in meeting the needs of so many impoverished survivors. I would like to ask Harris for direction and guidance, and perhaps we can establish a small group of interested members of our community who can try to do something. I imagine there were many upset readers who would like to be part of the solution, but we can't act on our own.

Gov't funding cut in Israel

That was a nice photo of Henry and Julia Koschitzky being honoured for their contribution to the latest charity, sending food to hungry Israelis ("Koschitzkys honoured at Leket Israel benefit," Jan. 19). The poor and needy do indeed enable us to earn the reward of doing good deeds, as it is written that "charity redeems from death." Perhaps this is the key to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's program of cutting government funding – he is increasing the opportunities for North American Jewry to do good deeds, as it says in Pirkei Avot: "The Holy One, Blessed be He, wanted to make Jews meritorious, so he gave them more opportunities for doing mitzvot." North American Jewry already pays for Israel's ambulance service, universities and museums. Perhaps, next we will be asked to pay for other underfunded institutions, ranging from the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra to the Galilee Fire Department.

Filmmaker seeks uncle's friends

I'm a documentary filmmaker developing a film exploring the life of my great uncle, Sam (Shlomo) Stern, who immigrated to Palestine from Toronto in 1933 at age 21 and helped found Kibbutz Ginossar on the Kinneret.

Sam was born in 1912 in Lagov, a shtetl in the Kielce region of Russian Poland. He joined his siblings in Toronto when he was 12, studied accounting and was groomed to begin a career in his brother Moishe's dairy. Instead, he chose to help rehabilitate the Jewish homeland, where he died at age 27. When Sam left Toronto for the Yishuv, he was accompanied by five friends: David Weis, Saul Borkofsky, Joshua Wohlgelernter, Jay Helfand and Harry Goldstein. Sam died defending Ginossar during an attack in 1939, but what became of the others? I'd be thrilled to locate any of these men, who would now be in their 90s, or any of their relatives with memories and information. Anyone with information can contact me by leaving a message at 514-528-5615 or by e-mailing me at sheltep@gmail.com.

Why do some Jews think Obama is evil?

Uriel Heilman
JTA

When news outlets began reporting last month that the owner of the Atlanta Jewish Times had published an opinion column seemingly suggesting that Israel might be wise to assassinate U.S. President Barack Obama, the response from prominent American Jews was fast and furious.

Here was a Jewish newspaper publisher providing fodder for something the Anti-Defamation League regularly deplores as a pernicious antisemitic canard: that Jews are more loyal to Israel than the United States.

In his Jan. 13 column, Andrew Adler outlined what he said were three possible responses by Israel to Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon: a pre-emptive strike against Hamas and Hezbollah, a direct strike on Iran, or "three, give the go-ahead for U.S.-based Mossad agents to take out a president deemed unfriendly to Israel in order for the current vice president to take his place, and forcefully dictate that the United States policy includes its helping the Jewish state obliterate its enemies."

He continued, "Yes, you read 'three' correctly. Order a hit on a president in order to preserve Israel's existence. Think about it. If I have thought of this Tom Clancy-type scenario, don't you think that this almost unfathomable idea has been discussed in Israel's most inner circles?"

Condemnations rained from every corner, and Adler quickly apologized. By Jan. 23, the publisher had announced that he was resigning his position and putting up his newspaper for sale.

"I very much regret it. I wish I hadn't made reference to it at all," Adler told JTA on Jan. 20. On Jan. 23, he said he was "relinquishing all day-to-day activities effective immediately."

As wacky as Adler's column was, it was an extreme expression of a viewpoint that carries great currency among Obama's Jewish critics: that the president represents a serious danger to Jews and to Israel.

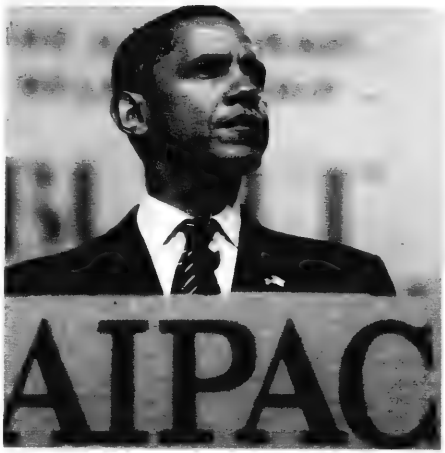
While few of those critics might go as far as Adler, it doesn't take much discussion in certain Jewish circles to find those who see something far more sinister in Obama than a president whose policies are bad for the Jews and Israel.

"I think Obama's overriding goal is to have Israel destroyed," said Randy Silver, a businessman from Glenview, Ill. "He puts steps in motion to bring about the destruction of the State of Israel."

One New Yorker who insisted on anonymity said, "He's not a Hitler in the sense that he's antisemitic and wants to put every Jew into a concentration camp – at least not as we see things right now."

He also said he believes that if Obama hangs on for a second term, he'll find a way to stay in the White House beyond that, even though the Constitution bars a president from serving a third term.

Noah, a physician from New York's Westchester County suburb who asked that his full name be withheld, told JTA: "I will admit to serious questions about whether he's a Muslim and whether he hates Jews. It's a possibility. I'm very uncomfortable with him."



U.S. President Barack Obama addresses an audience of mainly Jews at an AIPAC conference. [RNS]

To be sure, such views constitute a minority viewpoint even among Obama's Jewish detractors, and the American Jewish community has been – and largely remains – a stronghold of support for Obama. In 2008, Obama won an estimated 78 per cent of the Jewish vote, and even though his popularity in the Jewish community has dwindled during his Oval Office tenure, it has declined far less among Jews than among the general U.S. population. A Gallup poll released four months ago showed Obama with a 55 per cent approval rating among Jews, although an American Jewish Committee poll released at approximately the same time showed the president with a 45 per cent approval rating. Still, the AJC poll showed that Obama would win the Jewish vote against any hypothetical Republican candidate by at least 18 percentage points.

Obama is hardly the first president to be called an antisemite or hostile to Israel. In 1991, George H.W. Bush found himself the subject of withering Jewish criticism when he sought to delay $10 billion in loan guarantees for Israel unless Jerusalem agreed to a settlement freeze in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The national director of the Anti-Defamation League, Abraham Foxman, said he remembers holding a news conference to denounce Jewish characterizations of Bush as Satan and evil.

But the rhetoric and conspiracy theories against Obama seem to constitute an unprecedented level of vitriol, say many longtime observers of the Jewish political scene.

"I've never seen as much enmity toward a president by American Jews as I do toward Obama," said Morton Klein, national president of the Zionist Organization of America. "I've never heard people say, as they say to me, 'I hate him.'"

Klein, who called on the American Israel Public Affairs Committee to disinvite Obama from its annual policy conference last year and thinks AIPAC should bar Obama from this year's conference, lays the blame on the president.

"Among those who care about Israel, he surely is to blame for it," Klein said. "Every chance he gets, he blames Israel."

Foxman says that extreme hatred of Obama is not so much about the president's policies as it is about America's economic troubles, the sense that Israel faces greater existential threats today than at any time in the last 30 to 40 years, and the Internet, which amplifies and spreads radical voices and conspiracy theories.

"All of these add an anxiety element that intensifies fear and anxiety," Foxman told JTA. "Attitudes have intensified."

Then there's Obama himself – a black president with the middle name Hussein who has been accused even by some Jewish Democrats of not being able to show sympathy for Israel in his kishkes.

"Here's a president who doesn't show emotion on anything, and the Jewish community is used to emotion," Foxman said.

Democrats blame the Republicans for the vitriol. Republicans say Democrats are practising divisive politics.

Obama's most vehement Jewish critics are not the only ones who accuse Obama of being a secret Muslim, a socialist and a threat to America. Many Tea Party activists have sounded similar themes, with some going so far as to decry his administration as pursuing Nazi-like policies.

But Obama's most extreme Jewish critics also accuse him of seeking to erase the Jewish character of the Jewish state and plotting to wage war against Israel or the Jews. They see antisemitic overtones even in Obama's hiring of Jewish advisers.

"A Jacob Lew or a Rahm Emanuel is a danger to the Jewish people because they make treif look kosher," Silver, the Illinois businessman, said of the current and former Obama chiefs of staff. "I think these are anti-Jewish Jews. They make Obama look like he's not a threat, but he's a clear and present danger to Israel."

A Jewish New Yorker named Clive said of Lew's hire: "We know that Pharaoh hired Joseph because it suited him, but down the road, when it didn't suit him, he made his family slaves."

Pamela Geller, a Jewish writer whose blog, Atlas Shrugs, is a popular source of information for anti-Obama conspiracy theorists, says Obama is trying to stir up Muslim enmity toward Jews.

"The president of the United States is advancing jihad against the oath of office that he took," Geller wrote in April 2010. "If he is agitating Muslims against Jews, will he declare war on Israel?"

Obama administration officials repeatedly have denounced these sorts of accusations as patently false and waged a campaign in the Jewish community to highlight the president's record on issues of Jewish concern, ranging from domestic issues to Obama's pushes for Iran sanctions and endorsement of unprecedented U.S.-Israel military co-operation.

But ultimately, for that subset of the Jewish community that sees ominous signs in Obama's record, the concern isn't so much what Obama has done so far in his three years in office as it is what he might do in the future.

"He takes baby steps and is slowly putting things in play to do Israel damage in the long run," Silver said. "There's a strategy behind this."

Miriam Adelson gives $5 million to Gingrich

JTA

NEW YORK — Miriam Adelson, wife of casino and hotel magnate Sheldon Adelson, has donated $5 million to a group supporting Newt Gingrich for the Republican presidential nomination.

The donation matches one given earlier last month by her husband to Winning Our Future, an independent committee, or super PAC, that is run by former Gingrich associates, according to a report in the Las Vegas Review-Journal, citing GOP sources. Major media outlets confirmed the report Jan. 23.

The funding came just days after Gingrich scored an upset in the South Carolina primary and ahead of a key primary in Florida on Jan. 31.

Super PACs can raise unlimited sums from corporations, unions and other groups, as well as individuals, and indirectly support a political candidate. They cannot by law coordinate with the candidate's official campaign.

Miriam Adelson, an Israeli by birth, runs two non-profit drug treatment and research centers in Nevada and Israel.

Sheldon Adelson, chairman and CEO of the Las Vegas Sands Corp., is worth more than $21 billion, according to Forbes magazine. He is a major giver to Birthright Israel, which provides free 10-day trips to Israel for Jews aged 18 to 26.

What we choose to make of memory

Within the span of a day in New York, I paid respects at two memory sites. They commemorated two different sets of events, separated by more than half a century, each murderous and horrifying. Each struggled with what it means to remember – that is, with the ethical obligation of the rememberer.

One, the Face of the Ghetto, an astonishing exhibition of photographs by Jewish photographers in the Lodz Ghetto, turned the United Nations Visitors Center into Jewish memory space. Organized by the German Topography of Terror Foundation – an organization that grew out of imperative to remember and account for atrocities perpetrated by the Nazi SS and Gestapo – the exhibition drew from thousands of archival photos uncovered by the organization's researchers and was first mounted earlier this year in Berlin. It opened at the UN as part of the UN's official Holocaust Remembrance Week events in January.

The Lodz Ghetto was the last to be "liquidated" during the Holocaust, when the remnants of its population – those that had not already succumbed to disease and starvation, or been shipped off to death camps – were transported to Auschwitz in the summer of 1944. Its relative longevity was due to the controversial policy of its leader, Chaim Rumkowski, to make the ghetto's labour force "indispensible" to the German economy. In the end, however, the ghetto was doomed, because the goal of the Nazis was the utter eradication of the Jews.

Rumkowski deployed a cadre of photographers to demonstrate to the Germans the ghetto's productivity. The photographers went well beyond this mandate, documenting the efforts of the ghetto Jews to normalize their lives under horrifyingly abnormal conditions, and their rapid deterioration despite their best efforts. The accompanying wall boards incorporated lengthy quotations from the Lodz Ghetto Chronicle, so that visitors to the exhibition could see what ghetto inhabitants saw and encounter their words.

But, as Lodz survivor Roman Kent reminded visitors, photographs can't capture the extreme cold or the stench of the ghetto, nor the pain of parents whose children were taken to their death, nor the courage of the musicians and artists whose insistence on maintaining culture against all odds gave others inspiration and comfort. He called them "messengers of life," something far more significant than the "gun-carrying messengers of death" bent on destroying them.

Turning the UN into Jewish memory space is significant, not only for what it says about the past, but what it points to in the present and the future. German Ambassador Peter Wittig pointed to the need to take account of a disturbing trend – that "antisemitism is still an issue in many European countries and beyond." He saw the potential of the photographs to educate young people about the dangers of antisemitism.

The second memorial site I visited, the 9-11 memorial, located at Ground Zero in southern Manhattan, commemorates the victims of the 2001 act of terrorism that brought down the twin towers of the World Trade Center. Unlike the UN exhibition, which brought the memory of a European event to North America, the 9-11 memorial is located on the site of destruction. Rather than depict the events, the memorial uses a more abstract design to convey the tragic loss of human life, and the unspeakable bereavement in its aftermath.

Designed by Israeli architect Michael Arad, the memorial consists of two identical pools, each occupying almost an acre. Each pool is a perfect square, fed by thirty-foot waterfalls on all sides. In the centre is an even deeper pool into which the water disappears. From most vantage points, one can't see the bottom, giving the impression of an abyss, a void, or an open grave. I thought of the biblical Sheol, and of Jacob's anguished lament for his vanished son Joseph: "I shall go down to my son mourning unto Sheol."

As different as they were, both memorials emphasize the same thing: the need to commit to ending hatred. A video at the 9-11 Visitors Center reiterated the themes of unity, loss and building a future free of hate. At the opening of the Face of the Ghetto exhibit, Roman Kent expressed the same sentiment: that the presence of the photographs at the UN "symbolize that humanity all one people living on the planet."

Israel needs Holocaust education for haredim

Most available education about antisemitism in general and the Holocaust in particular aims at prevention. Although there's still plenty of antisemitism around, even in this country, we don't know how much more there would have been had not schools and other institutions – by no means all of them Jewish – made great efforts to open the eyes and minds of ordinary Canadians, especially the young.

The annual Holocaust Education Week in Toronto and elsewhere is making a monumental contribution in this endeavour.

Rabbi Harry Brechner of Victoria, B.C., wants to go further. He hopes to enlighten people about the evils of the Holocaust for remedial purposes. As reported in The CJN and other media, on New Year's Eve, tombstones were desecrated in his congregation's cemetery. Instead of the usual expressions of horror and calls that the culprits be swiftly brought to justice, Rabbi Brechner published an open letter in a local newspaper inviting the perpetrators to come forward not for retribution, but for education.

The rabbi wrote: "What I ask is that you take ownership and responsibility for your actions and make things right. I want to offer you an opportunity for soul repair... Come clean the grave sites, and when you are through take a tour with me around the cemetery and meet some of the people there who defied Nazism." A number of Holocaust survivors are said to be buried there.

I hope that Rabbi Brechner will get the response he wants, not only for the sake of the well-being of his own community but also as an example of how to bring sanity to haredim in Israel through this kind of Holocaust education.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

At a demonstration in Jerusalem around the same time as the incident in Victoria, many haredim came out to protest the widespread outrage against their treatment of women. Instead of showing solidarity with the victims, the demonstrators were there to hail the perpetrators.

There've been numerous incidents in Israel of haredi men attacking women, including an eight-year-old girl, for not dressing "modestly." They've defaced posters that depict women. They've verbally abused those who've refused to accept segregated seating in buses. In some neighbourhoods, haredim have even prohibited women from walking on the same sidewalks as men.

Like the culprits in Victoria, the demonstrators in Jerusalem have deployed Holocaust imagery to give vent to their hatred. They donned yellow stars of the kind Jews were compelled to wear by the Nazis. Some of their children were dressed in uniforms worn by concentration camp inmates. On a haredi website, a police chief was compared to Hitler.

The argument of the zealots is that Israel is a Nazi state. Compared to this calumny, the attack on the cemetery in Victoria seems rather benign. Is it possible that, like the Canadian vandals, these Jewish zealots didn't understand the implications of what they were doing? They may be kept so ignorant by their schools that they aren't aware of what the Nazis did to their forbears. Although ignorance shouldn't excuse their reprehensible acts, remedial education may bring them to their senses.

The proposed law in Israel to prohibit the use of Nazi imagery isn't likely to deter haredi fanatics from continuing to describe Israel as a Nazi state and hobnob with every enemy of Israel who expresses hostility to its very existence.

Perhaps education will do better than legislation. One of the many problems in the haredi school system is that secular studies are mostly banned, including Jewish history. That's why Israel must uphold the law that insists on basic Jewish instruction in all haredi schools beyond that which they regard as holy study. This must include Holocaust education.

But in view of the haredi propensity to defy Israeli legislation, an approach of the kind suggested by Rabbi Brechner might do better. Just by showing the zealous demonstrators how their forbears died at the hands of the Nazis may open their eyes, and perhaps even their hearts, to the implications of their actions. It may help them to recognize that their protests have horrible connotations that also threaten their own existence.

And the best people to impart such knowledge would be other Orthodox Jews. In the wake of recent events in Israel, many responsible leaders of Orthodoxy have distanced themselves from the haredi excesses and condemned their actions. They'd be the most effective teachers.

An icon of American literature

J.D. Salinger's quasi-autobiographical novel about teenage angst and adolescent alienation, The Catcher in the Rye, is a classic of American literature. Written as a series of short stories when he served as a soldier in the U.S. army during World War II, the book was published on July 16, 1951, to mixed reviews. Nonetheless, it took off, spending nearly a year on the New York Times' bestseller list.

Sixty-one years on, the novel remains astonishingly popular. By all accounts, 250,000 copies are sold each year in various languages. Still more astounding, world-wide sales have been 65 million.

In hindsight, any publisher would have been thrilled and honoured to have published The Catcher in the Rye. Yet when Salinger submitted the manuscript, the publisher requested a rewrite, and the editors of The New Yorker, which had published several of Salinger's short stories, saw fit not to print excerpts, claiming that its characters, including Holden Caulfield, were unbelievable and too precocious.

Fortunately, Salinger, possessing remarkable self-confidence and tenacity, did not despair. Another publisher scooped up the manuscript, and Salinger's stratospheric career was launched, with short stories and novellas – Nine Stories, Franny and Zooey and Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters and Seymour: An Introduction – flowing from his fecund pen.

The eccentric and reclusive man who has touched so many lives is the subject of a most thorough and satisfying biography. Kenneth Slawenski's J.D. Salinger: A Life (Random House) takes a reader from his formative years in Manhattan to his cloistered existence in the backwoods of rural America. Being the founder of a website dedicated to Salinger, DeadCaulfields.com, the author is tremendously well versed and writes with great authority.

Jerome David Salinger, known to his parents as Sonny, was a hybrid. His mother, Marie Jillich, was of German, Scottish and Irish descent. His father, Solomon, was Jewish, his Lithuanian grandfather having immigrated to the United States in 1881. Marie met Solomon in 1910, embraced Judaism and changed her name to Miriam.

Raising their children in a secular and humanistic home, they celebrated both Christmas and Passover, but eventually, abandoned all displays of religious affiliation. Salinger was close to his mother, who always believed in him and to whom he dedicated

The Catcher in the Rye. His relationship with his father was strained.

Salinger grew up amid the affluence of the Upper East Side and attended a private school, where he earned passable grades. Salinger wanted to study acting, but his father insisted on a military boarding school. At Valley Forge Military Academy, Salinger observed, he became a writer. Slawenski claims he used Valley Forge as the basis of Holden Caulfield's prep school.

After dropping out of New York University, Salinger drifted. In an attempt to give him some direction, his father, the general manager of a European cheese and meat import company, sent him on a business trip to Austria and Poland. The relatives he met in Vienna were murdered during the Holocaust.

Upon returning, Salinger enrolled at Ursinus College, a German Reformed Church institution worlds away from New York. Joining the campus newspaper, he wrote his first published story. According to Slawenski, his desire to become a professional writer was hatched here.

In 1939, he enrolled at Columbia University, signing up for classes in short story writing and poetry. One of his instructors, Whit Burnett, the editor of Story magazine, accepted his first short story, The Young Folks, shortly before his 21st birthday, and would later urge him to write The Catcher in the Rye. In a burst of enthusiasm, Salinger submitted more stories to other magazines, but they were summarily rejected. Salinger, never allowing self-doubt to dilute his ambition, continued writing. His persistence paid off, with Esquire publishing The Heart of a Broken Story in 1941 and with The New Yorker accepting yet another one of his short stories shortly afterward. By then, he was represented by one of the most prestigious literary agencies in Manhattan.

Salinger was also busy chasing Oona O'Neill, the daughter of the famous playwright Eugene O'Neill. She broke his heart and left him for the actor Charlie Chaplin. Slawenski documents his liaison with O'Neill – which he describes as "the great romantic tragedy of [his] life" – at length.

Drafted by the army in 1942, Salinger was in the thick of combat during the war, landing in Normandy on D-Day in 1944. The horrors and agonies he witnessed would reverberate in his stories, some of which appeared in the mass-circulation Saturday Evening Post.

As a member of the 4th Infantry Division, he took part in the liberation of the Dachau concentration camp system. It was an event that shook him to his core. After the war ended, Salinger was attached to a counter-intelligence unit charged with the de-Nazification of occupied Germany. While in Germany, he married a German national, Sylvia Louise Welter, but the marriage was over within a year.

J.D. Salinger in 1950

By 1946 – the same year The New Yorker finally published his story Slight Rebellion off Madison – Salinger was studying Zen Buddhism and mystical Catholicism. Later, he embraced Christian Science. Slawenski offers no explanation why he was not drawn to his Jewish roots.

In 1948, The New Yorker not only published A Perfect Day for Bananafish, but put him on a retainer with an annual salary. From this point onward, he wrote exclusively for The New Yorker.

Having achieved recognition, he wrote For Esme – with Love and Squalor, one of his greatest stories. Basking in its glow, he devoted himself to finishing The Catcher in the Rye. He hated the celebrity it conferred on him and developed a fear of being recognized by admirers.

Craving normality, he moved to Cornish, New Hampshire, a village 240 miles north of New York City. There he converted a dilapidated barn, deep in the dense forest, into a livable home.

He lived in Cornish with his second wife, Claire Douglas, whom he divorced in 1967. In 1972, he became romantically involved with Joyce Maynard, a writer who was 35 years his junior. It would not be his last romantic relationship with a woman.

At Cornish, Salinger withdrew from the world. "His isolation was an insidious progression that slowly enveloped him," Slawenski says. Salinger's seclusion compounded the public fascination with him and burnished his legendary status.

Slawenski brusquely dismisses Hapworth 16, 1924, published in 1965 as his last piece, as "unreadable" and "completely indigestible."

Salinger died on Jan. 27, 2010, at the ripe old age of 91. His son, Matthew, wrote an eulogy that distilled his father's essence: "Salinger had remarked that he was in this world but not of it. His body is gone, but the family hopes that he is still with those he loves, whether they are religious or historical figures, personal friends or fictional characters."

His death redoubled interest in his formidable body of work, with Amazon.com depleting its stock of his most famous titles. Salinger is gone, but his stories live on.

I have confidence in Romspen for my RRSP.

After the first month of incorporating Romspen into my RRSP, I knew I made the right decision. I have since made multiple transfers from my growth portfolio to Scotiatrust which holds my Romspen Mortgage Fund units. I am planning to invest more again this year. It is comforting and satisfying to see my RRSP grow with regularity. With Romspen I have a strategy that's perfectly in tune with my retirement goals. No other investment has made me feel better.

CIJA offers media training to community

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A conversation with a reporter is unlike any other discussion.

That's one of Jordan Kerbel's first lessons in the media training seminars he gives as part of his duties with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

For the past five years, Kerbel, CIJA's deputy director of communications and training, has been helping Canadian Jewish leaders and pro-Zionist campus groups articulate a clear message about Israel to the media.

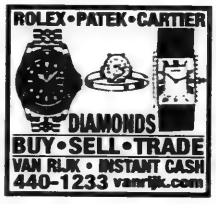
Initially an outreach program of Canadian Jewish Congress – which was replaced by CIJA last year – the seminars continue to be offered free of charge to organizations and individuals who speak to the media about the Jewish state.

"I help prepare our community spokespeople to be effective media communicators," Kerbel said. "It is [CIJA's] responsibility to the community to be able to offer value-added services, workshops and educational opportunities like this."

Giving the seminars isn't just a duty, it's a passion, he said.

A reporter by training, Kerbel worked for 10 years as a news and sports anchor at the CBC and conducted hundreds of interviews during that time.

"I was often surprised at what people shared with me," he said, adding that his interviewing style was never that of the hard-hitting, relentless interrogator. "That's not in my character, and it would have been false to have acted that way. I tried to be more friendly and have engaging, meaningful dialogue."



Kerbel believes anyone who could potentially speak to the media about Israel should learn how to speak in a way that bolsters the state's image, and the training shows how to deliver clear information about Israel.

"We work a lot on message development and deciding what story it is we want to tell. I look at media as a partnership. You're offering me an opportunity to help craft a story that you are going to be telling. So I have to know beforehand what it is I want to say and how I want to represent myself or my organization."

Kerbel said the training helps people feel more confident and comfortable in front of a microphone or camera.

As part of the process, participants are put through a series of mock interviews, from friendly to very hard-hitting.

"Generally people make mistakes at the beginning. A media interview is not a natural conversation. Someone putting a microphone in your face is not natural. But that's why this training is available," he said.

The seminars stemmed from a call by Jewish campus groups for help to fight the rise of "Israeli apartheid week" (IAW) on campuses around the world.

Kerbel said he's since done a lot of work with various Hillel groups, as well as the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) and unaffiliated students.

The campus groups were the first to take advantage of the training, he said, because they were on the front lines of the effort to counter IAW.

Former students of the course include Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto; Esther Mendelsohn, treasurer of Israel on Campus at the University of Toronto, and Rebecca Cherniak, former vice-president, internal, of the CFJS.

They all praise Kerbel and the seminars.

"I use Jordan's tips to this day. I highly recommend his sessions to anyone, new or seasoned with the media, who plans to speak to the media," Apple said. "I love how Jordan is really warm, approachable, and professional, and his workshops are fun, educational, thought-provoking and very hands-on."

Mendelsohn said she also "benefited greatly" from the training.

"His training has made me more media savvy and confident. I simply would not be able to do what I do on campus were it not for his help," she said. "He really understands the challenges we face. Practising and getting feedback from a real journalist gives students the skills and confidence to do real interviews where there are no second takes."

Jordan Kerbel

Cherniak concurred, saying the training, which she first took in 2008, helped demystify the media. "Since then, I've listened to Jordan's presentation five times and I always learn something new. ... [he] helped empower me to deliver the same training to local student leaders, which helped them deliver powerful messages," she said.

Cherniak said Kerbel helped her learn how to not let others define her message and how to prepare for an interview.

Past trainees include federation leaders and presidents, and their spokespeople, he said.

Kerbel emphasized that he never tells people what to say.

"I let the participants come up with their own messaging. Sometimes they come up with wording that will blow your mind, and I love that. People have to be comfortable with their own words. It's not about regurgitating what [CIJA] wants them to say," he said.

He added that CIJA offers the seminars to any pro-Zionist group or individual – whether they're right wing or left wing isn't a consideration.

The training can also cover "citizen journalism," offering individuals instruction on how to write letters to the editor or to their political representatives. "This workshop is geared toward getting community members involved in the conversation, whatever it is. But whatever vehicle one chooses, the question to ask is always, 'What do you want to say and how do you want to represent yourself?'"

While the training is readily available, Kerbel said many people still aren't aware of it, and they often find out about his seminars via word of mouth.

"Hopefully, this story will help make our service more known. All community members need to do is e-mail me or call me. At the end of every session, I leave people with my card and I say, 'If you have an interview scheduled and you just want to practice, we can do a mock run.'"

Veteran journalist weaves conspiratorial tale

The brazen self-assurance of Tony Burman is something to behold. Burman is the former head of CBC News and most recently of Al Jazeera English. He's now back in Toronto as a journalism professor at Ryerson University and is a columnist with the Toronto Star. In his Jan. 21 column, he opened with the following bold prediction: "There will be a war in the Middle East within the next several months, triggered by an Israeli attack on Iran."

Words such as "likely" or "possibly" don't figure in Burman's vocabulary.

He went on to describe how the war will unfold. Implying a parallel between former U.S. president George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Burman wrote that, "Like the Iraq war, [Israel's attack] will be a fatal blend of political arrogance and near criminal risk-taking." Just as the American-led Iraq war has been seen by many as a fatally misconceived and tragically wasteful war of choice, not of necessity, Burman implicitly argues that like Bush, Netanyahu will lead Israel into the same sort of tragic and unjustified misadventure in Iran, spurred on by arrogance and aggression.

Having asserted that Israel "will" attack Iran, Burman contradicted himself by adding, in the same opening paragraph, "But we should also know that the time to prevent [Israel's attack] is running out." It apparently did not occur to him that if what you claim will happen can be prevented, and thus won't happen, you're admitting that you're not sure at all about your prediction. But let this pass. Why, after all, should a small matter of logic interfere with a gripping tale.

On the matter of Burman's account of Israel's aggression, he argued that the murder of four Iranian nuclear scientists in the last few years was "most certainly" the work of Israel's Mossad. He claims to know, as a matter of fact, things that others speculate about but for which hard evidence is entirely lacking. Yet he has no problem expressing doubt about something for which there is a growing abundance of reliable evidence: the pressing nature Iran's nuclear threat.

Mixing certainty about Israel's alleged hostile intent with doubt about Iran's, Burman wrote: "The fractious government of Benjamin Netanyahu is obsessed with the prospect of a nuclear Iran, even if the evidence is unclear how imminent that threat is."

In Burman's conspiratorially-based account, Iran is being victimized by western economic sanctions and is being reduced to a state of "desperation." Compounding this desperation is the Mossad's murderous operations, which are "humiliating" Iran and are designed by Israel to force Tehran to retaliate. This will conveniently give Netanyahu the pretext he's looking for to strike out against Iran in "self-defence."

Not only is Iran being entrapped by Netanyahu's machinations, so, it turns out, is the United States itself. How so? Well, as Burman construes matters, Netanyahu has calculated that President Barack Obama will be re-elected next fall but will be "politically cornered" just before the elections, including by the Republicans in Netanyahu's corner, not to look weak. Consequently, Burman implies, Obama will be forced to go along with, or at least not oppose, an Israeli attack on Iran during that time.

Tony Burman

It's yet another conspiracy in which the Israeli tail wags the American dog.

Reflecting on Burman's presumptions, Jim Lederman, a former CBC Radio news reporter (1967-1982) and the author of a highly acclaimed book on the media and Israel, said: "At this point, nobody, not even the Israeli leadership, can be certain that an attack will take place this year – as Burman asserts. The situation is simply too fluid, and everyone involved is playing a game of chicken on the brink."

Lederman, who finds Burman's cocksureness "frightening," added: "Burman's statement late in his piece that 'of course' we can't be certain that events will unfold as he predicts is nothing but a throw-away line of boilerplate in an otherwise one-sided harangue."

Charity helps kids who need drugs outside OHIP

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Aaron Maresky was only seven years old when he was diagnosed with the painful gastrointestinal (GI) disease called Crohn's.

"He couldn't eat, he couldn't drink, he had unbearable stomach pains," said Mandy Maresky, Aaron's mom.

Aaron, who had lost 30 pounds as a result of the chronic disease, spent the following three months in

Aaron, when he was diagnosed three years ago and out of the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto while doctors tried to find a medication that would relieve his symptoms.

They found success with a class of drugs called biologics, which treat the symptoms of Crohn's and other diseases.

As soon as Aaron began receiving infusions of Remicade, a drug that is not covered by OHIP and costs about $4,000 a month, his condition improved immediately.

"It was amazing. We started to think that maybe they had misdiagnosed him," Maresky recalled.

Luckily, the Mareskys have insurance that covers the cost of the expensive drugs.

Maresky said her son, who went from being a "normal, very active" seven-year-old to a child who had to receive painful infusions each month, didn't waste time feeling sorry for himself.

During one of his frequent visits to SickKids, Aaron pulled some money from of his pocket – the allowance his mother had given him – handed it to a nurse, and asked her to give it to another family in need.

Giving money and gifts to other families in the GI clinic at SickKids during his monthly visits became a regular occurrence.

Maresky suspects Aaron had noticed the support he received from family and friends, as well as Chai Lifeline Canada, a non-profit organization that supports children with serious illness.

"Because Aaron saw what a difference this made to him, he wanted to give back and do the same for other children," Maresky said.

"One day, he said, 'Let's just start our own charity.' Basically, that's how Aaron's Apple was born."

Aaron's Apple, a registered Canadian charity under the auspices of Chai Lifeline Canada, was co-founded by Aaron – who is now a 10-year-old Grade 5 student at Associated Hebrew Schools Kimel campus – and his parents.

It collects funds to help Canadian families without insurance pay for drugs that OHIP doesn't cover.

Maresky explained that Ontario residents who don't have insurance and can't afford the high drug costs can apply for assistance from the Trillium Drug Program. But, she added, the process to get approval could take months.

"When a child is very sick and wasting away and in a lot of pain, and they can't go to school, they don't have time to wait for approval. So with Aaron's Apple, we raise money, and the money will be given directly to the families to bridge the gap," Maresky explained.

"As soon as Trillium takes over, that's when we step back. Sometimes they don't get assistance, so we pay."

To date, Aaron's Apple has raised more than $50,000 and helped three families that were referred to the organization by SickKids.

She hopes the first annual Caring to the Core Gala will help raise upward of $100,000 to help more families.

Citytv reporter Galit Solomon and Gemini Award-nominated producer and television host Marshall Jay Kaplan will host the Feb. 11 gala, which will be held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The "adult-inspired" event will feature dinner, an open bar, entertainment, music and an auction, as well as a raffle to win a trip to the "Big Apple," New York.

Aaron, who is now at a healthy weight, but still experiences "flare-ups" said he was "very excited" about the upcoming gala.

Aaron last summer

Aaron said he hopes the event will raise "a lot of money because there are always going to be families that need help."

Maresky said Aaron's Apple offers help for children suffering from all kinds of chronic illnesses, not just Crohn's disease.

"We don't want to turn anyone down... No child should suffer and not have access to what they need."

Maresky said being a part of this charity helps her son and her family focus on something positive.

"He's very involved. He's an amazing kid. We're just so proud of him. He's so positive and he never complains."

Maresky said event sponsors are still welcome and more information about the organization can be found at www.aaronsapple.com.

Physician is part Jewish mystic, part gynecologist

Susan Ponting
Special to The CJN

In 1994, Dr. Alvin Pettle began to learn to disentangle himself from ego – no small feat for anyone, let alone a popular, in-demand physician.

He's part Jewish mystic, part gynecologist, and all soul.

Dr. Alvin Pettle

Alvie, as he's known to his many friends and patients, has a deep love and respect for women, and his life and career reflect that.

His personal journey shifted in 1994 when he began yearning for something more. At the time, he was chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Etobicoke General Hospital in Toronto, where he had delivered more than 10,000 babies.

But one day, he suddenly walked out of the busy office he ran with his wife, Carol, a nurse, saying, "I need to go for a walk."

He didn't come back for six months.

Carol and Alvin headed to Sherwood Forest, a Toronto park that has become a place of healing during certain times of their lives, "We just sat there. And I listened to the deepest part of my soul," he said.

Listening would be the key to his future. "When the student is ready, the teachers appear," he said, quoting the Buddhist proverb. And they did, in the form of people and every book he could get his hands on.

Pettle said he felt a sense of renewal after his awakening, and he knew it was time to break away from traditional medicine and move into a more holistic approach.

"I could sense being told, 'Now I'm going to show you how to really take care of women, and they will tell you what they need.'"

The fact that menopausal women were taking horse's urine through hormone replacement therapy (HRT) didn't make sense to him at all.

So the Canadian pioneer began to introduce bio-identical hormones to help women enter menopause. "Bio-ids" are made from botanical plants such as soy beans and yams. The human body can't convert soy or yams directly into natural hormones, so the natural plants are pharmaceutically processed in a transdermal cream.

His medical knowledge and his passion to understand hormones allowed him to help women in ways he hadn't been able to at the hospital. Now he's spends more time talking to his patients.

"Now I ask questions I never dreamed of asking before, like, 'Have you ever been abused?'" he said. "This is important information to gather for the well-being of my patients."

Pettle started to write prescriptions and figure things out. "I realized that some allopathic doctors are stubborn, educated by drug companies. Oh, God bless the drug companies, they do a lot of good, but they don't do [plant-based] hormones."

In the '90s, Pettle, as well as others in the medical community, said that "women must stop swallowing synthetic estrogen and stop taking synthetic hormones."

That was a risky move for the renegade doctor who was told to watch his back.

He recalled that fellow doctors contacted him, asking, "Alvie, what's wrong with you?"

To which he replied, "I'm trying to help women. We need to re-think this."

A young professor wrote him a note, asking, "How could you prescribe bio-identical progesterone to a woman without a uterus?"

Pettle replied, "You forgot she has breasts and organs that receive progesterone as well."

Although he doesn't take credit for it, Pettle's paradigm shift led to a sea change in the thinking of the medical community in which he was working. That took courage.

He has co-written two books with Lorna Vanderhaeghe, A Smart Woman's Guide to Hormones and Sexy Hormones. He's currently writing a book called What Women Have Taught Me.

"Women have taught me a lot, not the least of which is that it's time to turn our society from a patriarchal one to a matriarchal one," he said.

"Under our patriarchal society, there's too much testosterone. None of us would be here if weren't for women. It's time we begin looking into each other's eyes with a mutual respect.

"When people have respect for each other, magic happens."

At 66, Pettle said he feels better than he did at 35. Ever the philosopher, he muses, "Life is about seeking the truth in everything we do, and following your heart for the answers."

Pettle followed his heart all the way, as he puts it, from "self-destructing, moving too fast in the world of 24/7 medicine" to finding his place and peace among the women he clearly loves.

Working up a sweat in Israel

If you have a love of the outdoors, want to experience Israel from a different perspective and don't particularly like riding around in tour buses with tinted windows, there's a tour waiting for you. Especially if you're not afraid of working up a sweat.

Even if you've never crossed a desert wadi or swam in a cool spring in the Galilee, you'd probably recognize the logo of the Society for the Protection of Israel, the country's oldest and largest environmental organization. The society organizes tours that will take you to places most comfy tourists wouldn't dream of visiting, like hiking through canyons in the Negev or tubing down rivers in the north. During the summer, a few tours are offered in English, but joining a tour at other times of the years is a great way to see the country and pick up some Hebrew at the same time. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr8]

"Migrating Birds Know No Boundaries." That's the slogan of Israel's International Center for the Study of Bird Migration in Latrun, Israel – located at the junction of three continents, Europe, Asia and Africa – has long been known as a birder's paradise. You can track the patterns of birds migrating through Israel, watch a video of lesser kestrels, and get details about the second International Hula Valley Bird Festival coming up in November. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr11] For more on where to perch yourself to get the best view, check out Birding In Israel. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr12]

Care to see Israel on two wheels? The Arava Institute and Hazon offer a weeklong ride. It includes orientation, five cycling days and a day off for Shabbat. Hazon (vision) is an organization that promotes outdoor physical challenge and creates programs that look at food from a Jewish and contemporary context. Now's the time to get in shape for the October 2012 ride. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr13] If you can't wait, you can ride along vicariously with Elahn Zetlin, who donned a helmet-cam last year and documented the thrilling and panoramic trek from Jerusalem on to Eilat. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr14]

If you don't want to bother with a bike, there's always your own two feet. If those feet are connected to a body that's in good shape and is ready for a challenge, the Israel National Trail awaits. The trail "winds its way nearly 1,000 kilometres across Israel, from the Lebanese border in the north to the Red Sea in the south." If you are up to it, walking the entire trail should take about 30 to 45 days. The English language website is very good with plenty of practical information (don't hike the Negev in the summer!) and a lively discussion board for hikers considering setting foot. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr15]

As you bike, hike, wander and even slog your way around the country, you will eventually end up in some of the country's national parks. Israel has 296 national parks and nature reserves from the Galilee's Iyon Stream with its waterfalls and flour mills to Eilat's Coral Beach and underwater garden in the south. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr16]

And just when you thought you'd seen it all, VirtualTourist.com offers an incredible resource of hundreds of "Israel Off the Beaten Path" recommendations. [http://bit.ly/ecoisr17]

Happy Israeli trails to you.

The failure to reach teens

I've worked with teens in camps, schools, youth movements, Israel trips, service learning and Shabbatons. The breadth of programs is astounding and the depth of Jewish experiences created by many of these programs is powerful.

Yet despite programmatic richness and the community's multi-million-dollar investment, we struggle to reach Jewish teens. The teens I work with represent the elite – the small percentage engaged in Jewish activities. What's more, I see the same faces in Jewish schools, summer camps and travel programs, while most of their peers have little contact with any ongoing Jewish experience.

A U.S. study conducted by Brandeis University in 2000 found that while 86 per cent of kids in Grade 7 are engaged in some form of Jewish activity, by Grade 12 the number drops to 56 per cent. For non-day school students, these numbers are generously estimated at 60 per cent in Grade 7 and 20 per cent in Grade 12. A recent study of New York teens indicates the numbers have dropped even lower in the last decade.

The statistics groan on. While approximately 50 per cent of American teens are active in a youth movement, among Jews, only 20 per cent are involved. Participation in Jewish camps drops to 13 per cent by Grade 12, and only a marginal number of teens visit Israel. The Union for Reform Judaism, which recently launched a teen engagement campaign, estimates that if current trends persist, 80 per cent of children who become bnai mitzvah will have no connection to their synagogue by the time they reach Grade 12.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Our system stymies engagement. Our focus on the bar/bat mitzvah has resulted in it serving as a graduation from, rather than gateway to, Jewish activity.

While day school enrolment and Israel trip participation are higher in Canada than America, a planned, systematic approach to teen engagement is sorely needed in our community.

Synagogues and bar and bat mitzvah educators must see their roles as transition co-ordinators, guiding students to the next Jewish experience. Parents, who, despite teens' protests, play a significant role in adolescent identity formation, must be empowered to shape their children's Jewish journey. As a community, we must recognize that one point of contact does not suffice. As powerful as day school or camp may be, the effect of these experiences is marginalized when it's the only point of ongoing Jewish contact.

Teens offer great potential. Outside Jewish contexts, they participate at high levels in extra-curricular activities – sports, arts, community service – and a wide range of resume-building activities. They're interested in shaping opportunities that speak to their interests and, when engaged, they're passionate, devoted and social. During high school, they question their assumptions of identity and relationships, and actively seek mentors and guides on this journey.

The answer to teen engagement doesn't necessarily lie in more programming. We already have a menu of activities rich in diversity and depth. Rather, we must rethink the ways we connect with teens. To do so, we must work collaboratively with educators, parents, community leaders and teens themselves to plan multilayered pathways of Jewish experiences that flow from bar and bat mitzvah celebrations to Hillel on campus.

New JF&CS president has bat mitzvah

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Judy Winberg celebrated her 60th birthday last fall in a big way.

She had her bat mitzvah at Holy Blossom Temple, and she became president of Jewish Family and Child.

"Growing up, my brother had a bar mitzvah, but girls were not encouraged to study Hebrew. It's something I always regretted."

When she learned that Holy Blossom was offering a two-year b'nai mitzvah program, she signed up and began learning Hebrew. "I didn't really intend to participate in the service, but it was scheduled on the day of my 60th birthday. It seemed perfect."

The wife and mother of three children, Winberg, an educational consultant, said that becoming involved in JF&CS was a natural thing to do, because community service has always been part of her family.

"My mother Doodie Libman and I were co-chairs of the Hadassah bazaar, and now my children are actively involved in the community. They've followed our example."

As president of the JF&CS board of 24 members, she said, she sits on five committees and is the spokesperson for the agency to its three funders – UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Ministry of Children and Youth Services, and the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Judy Winberg

A teacher before she became an educational consultant, Winberg wanted to stay involved with children and their families, so she joined JF&CS's youth services committee.

"I wanted to help send out the message that child abuse exists in the Jewish community, and there are a number of Jewish children who live in poverty. There is still denial. I want to raise the profile of our agency, so people will become aware of the services we offer.

"Denial is not as strong as it used to be, but raising awareness is important. I think that many people do not understand that children's aid societies not only protect children, they also offer services for families. Too often, people find out about us only when they need us [in a crisis]."

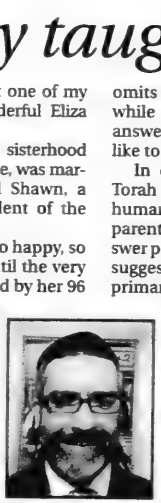
Among its many services, she said, JF&CS runs bereavement groups, groups for parenting and divorced parents, a chaplaincy service, and is a leader in its work in high-conflict divorce. "We are much more than a children's aid society, and we want people to know it."

Winberg said that times are tough everywhere, and JF&CS is doing what it can on a limited budget.

"Our needs have increased tremendously and our funding has not. There has been an increase in intake calls, and more children are involved in our programs."

The agency's major fundraiser, to be held May 14 at the TIFF Bell Lightbox, is Jewish Folks Telling Jewish Jokes, hosted by Harvey Atkin. "We're honouring amateur Jewish joke-tellers everywhere."

They taught a lesson to all



Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

A few weeks ago I lost one of my teachers when the wonderful Eliza Shawn passed away.

This woman, the first sisterhood president of my synagogue, was married to the late Edward Shawn, a founder and first president of the kehila.

This eshet chayil was so happy, so positive and so active until the very end. All of us were blessed by her 96 years, and her enduring legacy will be cherished by many more than just her five children, 14 grandchildren, and 20 great-grandchildren.

I sometimes wonder how this woman became such an inspiration for so many. I believe the Torah has an answer in the beginning of the book of Shmot, where it states, "And a man went from the house of Levi and he took a daughter of Levi. And the woman conceived and gave birth to a son."

Later on, the Torah tells us that these two were none other than Amram and Yocheved, the parents of Moses.

We may ask why the text initially omits the names of Moses' parents, while revealing them later? Many answers are given, two of which I'd like to share with you here

In describing Moses' birth, the Torah emphasizes that Moses is a human being with flesh-and-blood parents, not an angel. Another answer points out that the Torah avoids suggesting that Moses' lineage was primarily responsible for his position and achievements.

Moshe became the greatest prophet of all time on his own merit, achieving his position of leadership and realizing his potential by talent and hard work. It was not an issue of proteksia (social connections).

Mrs. Shawn did not become an inspiration through shortcuts. She became the wonderful woman she was through labour, love and perseverance – and by example. She assumed leadership positions on behalf of the Jews of her communities in Japan and Canada, after leaving her native India.

Life was not always easy for her, as she experienced significant hardships. She lived in Japan during World War II and lost a daughter just a few years ago. Nevertheless, she continued to live a rich and fulfilling life, always expanding her potential.

My father, Meir Yaacov Acoca, who passed away 18 years ago and whose yahrtzeit we recently remembered, was also a great mentor to many. His last years, too, were not easy. He was on dialysis for a couple of years before he passed away, but he took every moment with a smile, endearing himself to fellow patients and staff alike with his good humour at the clinic.

I once asked him how it was possible for him to be so positive in such difficult moments. His answer was brief but profound: "Make the best of every moment."

Mrs. Shawn and my father knew how to live each day as the special gift from God that it is. In their humility, I don't think they knew how many people's lives they would touch so deeply.

Let us all strive to live our lives as robustly as did these two very special people.

Campus play funny, yet thought provoking

Sara Harowitz
Special to The CJN

Through jokes, props, costumes and videos, Ron Jones and Larry Jay Tish, creators of a show called Black-Jew Dialogues, aim at shedding light on the shared histories of American blacks and Jews.

"You don't lose part of your own heritage by learning more about another," says Jones. "I think a lot of people don't want to give themselves credit for the fact that the more you learn about other people and the way things work in the world, the more capable you are of dealing with things."

It's an idea close to Jones' heart, one that has, in fact, turned into so much more. Jones, along with his friend and fellow actor Tish, recently came to Canada to perform their show at Ryerson University and the University of Toronto.

"The title just flew into my head," says Tish, who came up with the initial idea that he then proposed to Jones.

"I always was curious about the relationship between the African-American community and the Jewish community here in the States. I knew it had been estranged for a while. I wanted to explore it through comedy and through going over my story."

Comedy is an important tool used in the show, which was performed for the first time at a Canadian university last week.

It is through comedy that some of the difficulties of being a cultural minority in a melting pot like the United States or Canada can be overcome. Tish and Jones are, essentially, laughing through the pain.

For example, in one of the skits, Jones and Tish dressed up as old ladies who are meeting with their families for a picnic.

At first they seem to be wary of each other – the Jewish grandma even complains that a young black kid robbed her grandson.

But the more the two women talk, the more they discover they have in common – their dedication to their families, their issues that come with aging. The skit ends with the women swapping picnic baskets, and, in doing so, embracing the food, and complexities, of each other's cultures.

"The way I like to say it is we deal with serious things in a funny way," says Jones. "The issues we talk about are definitely serious. But the relationship we portray on stage is irreverent and it's fun. We hope that by showing our relationship – two guys on stage talking about tough things – we can show people that these are not taboo conversations, that you can talk to people about race and ethnicity and culture without feeling like you're automatically going to move to being offensive or becoming defensive."

Tish agrees.

"To me, racism and prejudice and some of the intense hatred that we have for one another is so absurd that it's funny," he says. "Comedy has always been the best vehicle for me to express the truth about life in a way that I think really gets across to people."

The Black-Jew Dialogues is somehow lighthearted and heavy all at once. Part sketch comedy and part social analysis, it is able to bring to the table serious issues surrounding race, religion and ethnicity without making the audience feel uncomfortable as part of the conversation.

"This performance presents the dialogue in a really creative and funny way," says Tamar Berger, the project's co-ordinator at Hillel GTA who oversaw the performances at Ryerson and U of T.

The Black Students Association, the West Indies Association and OACT (Oakham Amateur Campus Theatre), Ryerson's theatre group, also helped organize the Ryerson event.

"Sometimes it can be hard to talk about racism and prejudice. The show does it in such a light way that it really opens up the discussion."

And though the title of the show lends itself specifically to blacks and Jews, the conversation that spurs from it goes beyond those two cultural groups.

After the performance, Jones and Tish opened up the floor and led the audience in a participatory and insightful discussion.

Through an exploration of the most common racial stereotypes toward blacks and Jews, the audience was encouraged to address the issues some might be too scared to bring up.

"It would be my hope that people leave with a little more courage and take a little more action towards injustice and racism," says Tish.

"And, hopefully, they've laughed a little, too."

Wiesenthal Center objects to McMaster speaker

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) president and CEO Avi Benlolo says he's fed up with universities that continue to allow "hateful speakers" on campus.

"I've lost my patience with the universities. I think they're complicit in aiding and abetting these hate-mongers," Benlolo said, reacting to a lecture presented by pro-Iranian, anti-Israel speaker Zafar Bangash on McMaster University's campus last week.

The Jan. 26 lecture, titled "Iran in the Crosshairs," was sponsored by the Hamilton Coalition to Stop the War, Independent Jewish Voices, as well as the student groups Students for Justice in the Middle East, McMaster Muslims for Peace and Justice, and Students Resisting War and Occupation.

Benlolo wrote a letter to McMaster president Patrick Deane that challenged him to take a stand against a speaker who was quoted during last summer's Al Quds rally at Queen's Park as saying, "This black man in the White House, Barack Obama… he would rather have Americans starve to death but he cannot say no to the Zionist parasitical state… That is what makes them racists, that is what makes them inhuman, that is what makes them barbarians."

Bangash, president of the Islamic Society of York Region, who is known for advocating Iranian-style theocracy, has also said, "Inshallah [God-willing] I see that day when we, the Muslims, will march on Palestine and liberate Palestine… under Islamic law," and has advised Israelis to go "back where they came from: the U.S., Canada, Europe, Russia, whoever is willing to take them in."

Despite Benlolo's complaints, McMaster chose not to cancel the lecture, citing its "important role in maintaining freedom of speech."

McMaster spokesperson Gord Arbeau put the onus on the organizers of the event to ensure respectful dialogue on campus.

"Every event that is booked at McMaster follows the same protocols. Event organizers are responsible for ensuring a safe event and those protocols have been followed in this instance."

But Benlolo, who sends letters of complaint to university presidents each time he learns that an anti-Israel speaker has been invited to speak on a Canadian campus, said he is becoming tired of getting the "brush-off" from university administrators who he says hide behind the "freedom of speech" excuse.

"We're awaiting a response… I would expect the exact same response that I get from all the university presidents, which is what these universities hide behind. They say, 'We have to allow for freedom of speech and freedom of debate and the truth will prevail.'"

Benlolo added that the trend of having anti-Israel speakers lecturing on campus is "becoming intolerable," adding that "it's about time that the universities step up and draw a red line in the sand and say that speakers who are divisive and to an extent, antisemitic, should not be permitted on campus. Period."

McMaster's Jewish Student Association president Ariela Rozenek and McMaster's Israel on Campus president Jessica Lax-Vanek monitored the lecture.

Rozenek said that while Bangash mostly stayed on topic, there were "undertones of racism and bigotry" in his talk.

"I understand that McMaster wants to provide an environment that encourages discussion, that promotes freedom of speech, but the inflammatory language that was used by Bangash adds to a toxic, intolerant environment and stifles true dialogue."

She added that the students who attended the lecture as representatives of the Jewish community are working toward an inclusive environment, and lectures like the one delivered by Bangash go against that goal.

"We really try to host events that elevate the level of discourse on campus and this sets us back."

Benlolo said that if university presidents don't want to cancel these types of events, they should at least take a moral stand.

"There's a minimum and a maximum [response]. The minimum is that the president should denounce it, and the maximum is that the university property should not be made available for these speakers. It's public property and the university can define the rules and should not permit hateful speakers on their campus."

Montrealers, Israelis volunteer in Ethiopia

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Eight young Jewish Montrealers were transported out of their comfort zones into the harsh reality of poverty and disease in rural Ethiopia last month.

The group, aged 18 to 25, spent their winter break volunteering on non-sectarian humanitarian projects of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), joining 12 Israeli peers from Be'er Sheva/Bnei Shimon in the Negev.

"As we drove to the hotel [from the airport] and gazed out the windows, we all realized that this experience was going to be like no other," said Tamar Medalssy.

"Poverty struck you in the face," added Cedric Kessous. "I… wondered how one could live like that… All I could think to myself was 'where the hell am I?' But from that, I began to understand real poverty."

All of the participants describe the trip as having been life-changing.

During the mission, they assisted in the construction of a new schoolhouse, distributed nutritional bars to pregnant women, and helped hand out de-worming medication to children. They also spent time leading sports and educational activities with kids, who were delighted with the school supplies, toys and colouring items they brought along.

The participants' blogs and photos are at www.federationcja.org/ethiopia.

Students asked to 'draw Jewish music' for art contest

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Students in grades 1 through 12 are being asked to "draw Jewish music" for an art contest that is part of Jewish Music Week in Toronto: From Bible to Broadway.

The weeklong festival, now in its second year, will run from June 3 to 10. The contest deadline is March 15.

Young artists are being asked to draw what Jewish music means to them personally, what Jewish music makes them think of, or what Jewish music means to people everywhere, according to the event's website.

Entries will be judged on their originality, creativity and how they represent or have a connection with Jewish music, said Aliza Spiro, artistic director and founder of the festival.

Winning entries will be published online and in more than 20,000 brochures to be circulated in Toronto. As well, the winners will be part of an exhibit at the Gallery at the J, in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, during Jewish Music Week. Organizers also plan to feature them in a student art calendar.

"It's so interesting, because music and art are so closely related," Spiro said. The contest is "a way to get kids thinking about music and art [and] to build the creative part of their brain."

Judy Jacobs, managing director of the festival, said, "The response last year was very positive, and we look forward to seeing the creativity in this year's submissions."

Art contest entries will be judged by Wendy Ng, coordinator for elementary school programs at the Art Gallery of Ontario; Sara Levine Petroff, owner and curator of the Petroff Gallery; artist Rochelle Rubinstein; Jeanette Kuvin-Oren, the Connecticut-based Judaica artist who created Holy Blossom Temple's Torah covers, and artist and educator Tiana Roebuck.

Spiro added that she expects many of the concerts and recitals during the week will appeal to kids. The Renanim Youth Singers and several choirs from Jewish schools are among the performers.

As well, the closing program is a music marathon featuring teenage bands at the Zareinu Moveathon Festival.

Other events include chassidic entertainer Martin Davidson in a Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach tribute concert, Jewish jazz with pianist and composer Ron Davis, and a Yiddish and African-American musical celebration concert.

Overheard in Starbucks

Tammy Barrett
Special to The CJN

I was at the local Starbucks the other day. A mother was there with three kids. While she was ordering and paying, her youngest child picked up a sandwich. The mother's hands were full, and she didn't notice until she had finished paying and was walking away. She took the sandwich, smiled when she saw the tooth marks on the plastic, and turned to go to back to the cashier to pay for it. She didn't go to the end of the long line, of course. She had just paid.

I smiled at her, just as the cashier did, but then I heard someone say, "pushy Israeli."

על הדרת נשים

"אני מודה לכם על ההזמנה להרצות בכנס פוע"ה אך לא אוכל להופיע בו מהטעמים הבאים:
1. כפי שכתבתם בתגובה לתקשורת: בהוראת הרבנים הכנס אמנם יהיה פתוח לגברים ולנשים, אולם הישיבה תהיה בנפרד, ויתר על כן, ובאופן מוצהר – שהמרצים בכנס זה יהיו גברים בלבד. בעת שהסכמתי לתת את הרצאתי לא הייתי מודע להוראה זו, שאם כן – הרי שמלכתחילה לא הייתי נותן את הסכמתי. הגישה שנשים מנועות בעיקרון מלהיות מרצות עומדת בסתירה מוחלטת לערכים עליהם התחנכתי. הקביעה שנשים אינן יכולות להיות מוזמנות כמרצות בכנס לרפואת נשים היא גם אבסורד מהבחינה המקצועית וגם הדרת נשים במלוא מובן המילה. וזאת דווקא בתחום שבו יש לעמיתותיי – רופאות הנשים והגנטיקאיות – הרבה מה לומר ולתרום, לא פחות מאשר לנו, הגברים.
2. בשיחה שקיימתי היום עם הרב בנימין דוד הוא מסר לי שרבני העדה החרדית קבעו שרופא שיבטל את השתתפותו בכנס "גמור מבחינתם". אינני יודע למה הכוונה, אך אטול את הסיכון ובלבד שאוכל להישיר מבט לעיניהן של אמי, של אשתי, של בתי, של עמיתותיי למקצוע, של קהל המטופלות ויותר מכול – שאוכל להסתכל בעצמי בראי.
אני משער שדברים אלה יגרמו לכם, למארגי הכנס ולמשתתפיו, עגמת נפש. על כך צר לי באמת. במשך השנים שמחתי לסייע לכם בעצה ובהסבר על מחלות תורשתיות, וכך גם אמשיך לעשות בעתיד, אם תבקשו זאת ממני, לטובת הזוגות שפונים אליכם.

Fundraising lottery falls well short of goal

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's main Jewish community centre could lose a significant amount of money on its first-ever fundraising lottery after it sold less than half the available tickets.

On Jan. 18, the Asper Jewish Community Campus held a noontime draw to choose 36 prize-winners in the government-approved lottery, and while the results may have made the winners very happy, it's unlikely campus board members are sharing that feeling.

That's because just 1,169 tickets were sold out of 3,500 that were available. At $100 each, that translates into $116,900 raised, well below the hoped-for $350,000 and just a little more than the $100,000 in prizes.

As well, most of the campus' tenants were involved in selling tickets, with each receiving $10 for each one it sold, for a total payout of $11,690, Asper Campus board president Barry McArton said.

Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News reported that expenses associated with the lottery were $80,000, and it predicted a loss "likely in the $80,000 range."

The paper said the campus is forbidden by law from running a deficit, so a budget shortfall would result in higher rent for tenants.

In a statement the day after the draw, campus executive director Louise Kollinger said that "an audit of the lottery after all expenses and invoices are received will be conducted for submission to the Manitoba Lotteries Commission, as per the licence, after first being presented to the campus board of directors [this week].

"Many of the expenses incurred with this lottery were fixed to the number of tickets sold, and consequently those expenses are yet to be finalized. The campus board of directors will receive this information prior to any release to the public."

So what went wrong?

"We didn't sell enough tickets," campus board president Barry McArton said succinctly.

"The bottom line with anything like this is if you don't sell enough tickets, you are not going to be successful. Maybe it was the time of year."

The 14-year-old Asper Campus – which houses the Rose & Max Rady Jewish Community Centre, Gray Academy of Jewish Education, the Berney Theatre and the offices of most major Jewish communal organizations in the city – kicked off ticket sales on Nov. 1. Many older Jewish Winnipeggers spend the winter months in Palm Springs or Florida, and they begin leaving as early as November.

The grand prize in the lottery was a choice between a new Audi or $50,000 cash. Other prizes included a home theatre system, a wine tour of Italy, watches, iPads and several smaller cash awards.

The idea for the lottery came from McArton and board member Louis Trepel. Both have many years of experience in community fundraising.

"We were considering a number of different fundraising ideas," said McArton, the son-in-law of former Winnipeg Jewish community president Marjorie Blankstein. "A lottery is something that our Jewish community has never done before. We thought we would give it a try."

McArton said some of the hoped-for lottery profits were intended to help pay down the Asper Campus' $1 million debt, which is left over from the its last round of renovations in 2008.

"Anything we can do to bring down our [debt] will free up operating funds both to help reduce the amount of rent our tenants pay and provide us with more money for maintenance and upgrades to our building," McArton said. "Over one million people pass through our building every year. That results in a lot of wear and tear. We had to replace our boilers last year and the freezers in our restaurant this year."

McArton said the board is "going to be analyzing our lottery to try to determine what we could have done differently."

Asked if the campus would consider trying a lottery again in the future, he responded: "Not likely."

Protest in Montreal

MONTREAL — Faced with growing outrage over anti-Israel statements that the Jewish community and others regard as antisemitic, TV host Stéphane Gendron made an on-air statement of regret Jan. 27. Later the same day, his employer, V Télévision, issued a joint statement with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and HonestReporting Canada saying that "these types of comments will no longer be tolerated on [its] airwaves."

Ordinary ingredients — extraordinary meals!

By Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Leah Schapira, author of Fresh & Easy Kosher Cooking (Artscroll), has an energetic passion for creating scrumptious, uncomplicated dishes for the kosher cook, using ordinary ingredients to create extraordinary meals. You'll find more than 170 creative recipes for every day or for special occasions that are sure to tantalize your taste buds. There are fabulous, full-colour photos throughout the cookbook that will inspire you to stop reading and get in the kitchen to start cooking!

Schapira's Fresh & Easy Kosher Cooking includes menu suggestions, side dish pairing suggestions for each recipe, and tips for food preparation, storage and freezing. She offers cooking suggestions for what's in season, advises the reader how to choose pots, pans and utensils – she even explains how to pick the right pasta shape for each type of sauce.

Her mouth-watering recipe selection includes: Squash Souffles, Onion Blossoms, Caramelized Onion Kishka, Asian Burgers, Chimichurri Skewered Steaks, Chicken Panini, Orange-Glazed Flanken, Caramelized French Roast, Flanken Egg Rolls, Sundried Tomato Salmon, Pistachio-Crusted Tilapia and Lazy Man's Cholent, complete with cholent-making tips. Sweets include Rainbow Cupcakes (perfect for the birthday child), Everything but the Kitchen Sink Cookies, Healthy Peanut Bars, a No-Mixer Brownie and even a pareve Hot Molten Chocolate Cake (see recipe below).

As a young child, Schapira was a very picky eater. Foods couldn't touch each other: chicken was on one side of the plate, fries on the other. If they touched, the meal was over! Her parents ignored, promised and pleaded, even took her to doctor.

Schapira writes: "Finally, when I was eight years old, my mother took me into the kitchen. She involved me in the preparations – if I saw everything that went into a dish, I wouldn't be scared to try it… I became obsessed with knowing how everything was prepared. Once I made dishes, I wanted to try them. As a teenager, I took cookbooks to bed and fell asleep reading recipes."

She continues: "To all mothers of picky eaters: Never force children to eat. Instead, teach them how to cook. Let them understand how food is prepared. Learn what appeals to them. There's a world of great flavours out there."

A self-taught cook and seasoned international traveller, Schapira has been the food editor for two popular Jewish weekly magazines. She shares her love of cooking through her articles, through her website www.cookkosher.com, and through cooking demonstrations and classes. She lives in New Jersey with her husband and children.

Schapira encourages her readers to have fun in the kitchen, get creative and add some spice to their everyday meals. This is a cookbook that definitely deserves a place in your kitchen – it will make a wonderful gift for both the new bride and seasoned cooks. Let the cooking begin!

LO-MEIN NOODLES (pareve)

Can't find Thai sweet chili sauce? In Israel it's called chili matok. You can also substitute La Choy sweet and sour sauce, or make your own (recipe follows).

My mother was not too happy when my sisters and I, dressed in cream gowns, stationed ourselves at the buffet at another sister's wedding. The attraction was this pasta, which was being made fresh. It was so addictive, it was worth the risk of a stain.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, halved and sliced into thin strips
1/2 red bell pepper, sliced into thin strips
1/2 yellow bell pepper, sliced into thin strips
1/2 cup mushrooms, sliced
1/2 cup bean sprouts
1/2 lb. spaghetti, cooked according to package directions
3 tbsp. soy sauce
3 tbsp. Thai sweet chili sauce (recipe follows)

Heat olive oil in a sauté pan over medium heat. Add onion and cook for 1–2 minutes. Add peppers, mushrooms and bean sprouts. Sauté for 4-5 minutes more until vegetables are slightly soft and lightly browned.

Add spaghetti, soy sauce and sweet chili sauce. Cook for 2–3 minutes, stirring constantly. Yield: 4-6 servings.

Thai sweet chili sauce (Pareve)

Thai sweet chili sauce is one of the greatest condiments that exists. While I buy a ready-made version all the time, it's really easy and quick to make yourself.

Sweet chili is a sweet and spicy dipping sauce. Most recipes call for red jalapeño or chili peppers. Since the red ones aren't available all year round where I live, I substitute a red bell pepper with some crushed red pepper flakes. I use the sweet chili as a dipping sauce for egg rolls and wontons, in stir fries and, surprisingly, it tastes amazing with pizza!

2 cloves garlic, peeled
1/2 cup sugar
3/4 cup water
1/4 cup vinegar
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 large red bell pepper, seeds and stems discarded
1 1/2-2 tsp. red pepper flakes
1 tbsp. cornstarch
2 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. honey, optional

Using a food processor, blend together garlic, sugar, 3/4 cup water, vinegar, salt, bell pepper and red pepper flakes until well combined. Transfer to a 2-quart pot and bring to a boil. Lower heat and simmer for 5 minutes.

Dissolve cornstarch in 2 tablespoons water and add to mixture. Stir well until sauce thickens slightly. Add 2 tablespoons honey, if desired. Taste and adjust seasonings. Yield: 1 cup.

ASIAN-INSPIRED CHICKEN STRIPS

Dipping the chicken into cornstarch and then egg whites makes for an exceptionally crunchy, succulent chicken. Topped with an Asian-inspired sauce, it's a delicious supper that's only good fresh out of the pan. Serve with Lo-Mein Noodles (see recipe) or over rice with a side of roasted vegetables.

oil, for frying
4 chicken cutlets, cut into strips
3 egg whites
cornstarch, for dredging
2 tbsp. mustard
6 tbsp. sugar
4 tbsp. soy sauce
3 tbsp. sesame oil
4 tbsp. vinegar

Heat the oil in a frying pan over medium-high heat.

Place the egg whites into a small bowl. With a hand whisk or two forks, beat the egg whites until frothy.

Coat the chicken strips with cornstarch. Dip into the beaten egg whites and fry on both sides until crispy and golden. Transfer to a plate lined with paper towels. You will need to re-beat the egg whites often as you work.

Pour off the remaining oil in the pan. To the pan, add the mustard, sugar, soy sauce, sesame oil and vinegar. Cook for 1-2 minutes until the sauce is smooth. Return the chicken strips to the pan and stir gently until they are well coated and sauce clings to chicken. Serve immediately. Yield: 4 servings.

HOT CHOCOLATE MOLTEN CAKE

Some desserts leave me speechless.

On Pesach, substitute potato starch for the flour for fabulous results. I also like to exchange the sugar for confectioner's sugar.

4 oz. good quality bittersweet chocolate
1/2 cup oil
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 egg yolks
6 tbsp. flour

Preheat oven to 425. Thoroughly grease 4 individual glass oven-safe cups or a muffin pan.

In a double boiler, melt the chocolate with the oil. Remove from heat. Cool slightly.

With a fork or a whisk, stir in the sugar until well blended. Beat the eggs and egg yolks with a fork; quickly add to the double boiler. Add the flour, stirring constantly. Pour into the prepared cups and bake for 13-15 minutes.

Remove from the oven. Let stand for 1 minute. Invert onto a plate. Yield: 4 servings.

Firm focuses on doing social good through PR

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Deborah Weinstein admits she knew almost nothing about mundane stuff like balance sheets and income statements when she and her sister, Judy Lewis, went into business 29 years ago.

After all, how many "refugees from journalism" do?

What she did know was public relations and marketing and what she did have were contacts in the media and in a number of high-profile businesses that were willing to turn their campaigns over to their upstart company.

Since then, Strategic Objectives has become a market leader, with a focus on representing clients that practise "corporate social responsibility (CSR)." With its 40 employees and annual revenues north of $8 million, it's considered a fairly large player in the field and was recently named to the Top Ten CSR A-List 2012 by PR News. Among its many other honours, it was named PR Agency of the Year 2011 at the IABC/Toronto (International Association of Business Communicators) OVATION Awards. And Profit Magazine has named Strategic Objectives one of Canada's top 100 women-run businesses.

"Strategic Objectives is committed to using the power of PR to create social good and to help make a positive difference by advancing awareness of important social causes," said Lewis.

"PR with heart is fundamental to everything we do at Strategic Objectives," added Weinstein.

Casual consumers of advertising would recognize Strategic Objectives' clients in a heartbeat. The company's first "big client" was British clothing retailer Marks & Spencer. Although the company had had a presence in Canada for 11 years when they signed on with the sister act, they hadn't registered a profit.

Through word-of-mouth, the company turned to the sisters to handle their PR. Weinstein and Lewis had already developed a reputation for leveraging news items and feature stories in the media to promote corporate brands. They worked at virtually all the big Canadian TV networks and, at the end, produced Thrill of a Lifetime, a make-your-dreams-come-true reality series, making it Canada's top-rated show with a "$0 budget." They learned the hard way how to make the show news and get publicity.

When they took on the Marks and Spencer account, they were not much more than "two women with one desk and a typewriter," with Weinstein maxing out her Visa card to make sure they could pay their bills. They conceived of a campaign that would stress the company's adherence to quality merchandise.

"We got the products out to people who would write about them," Weinstein said.

"Kismet" and referrals from other journalists led them to their long-standing client, the Body Shop.

Strategic Objectives and Body Shop collaborated on a campaign that stressed the company's CSR – "doing good in their community," said Weinstein.

Associating a client with CSR "engages a brand with a cause," she explained. By consulting with clients, consumers, employees and other stakeholders, a cause is selected "that fits its corporate mentality."

Consumers appreciate it and that builds trust, relevance and loyalty to the brand. It's a win-win situation all around: the charity benefits from increased awareness and contributions, while the business enhances its reputation, she said.

The Body Shop has championed such issues as saving the elephants, community trade (avoiding low-wage jurisdictions) and stopping violence against women.

In the 1990s when Strategic Objectives brought the question of CSR to the table, it was something that was largely ignored in marketing campaigns, Weinstein said.

But the anti-violence "campaign we did was hugely successful and women got with the story because it was meaningful and new," she said.

The United Nations recognized Strategic Objectives' role in the effort by granting the firm its Grand Award for Outstanding Actions in PR.

Later, the Body Shop adopted Strategic Objectives' campaign to "Stop S*X Trafficking of Children and Young People."

Other familiar CSR campaigns spearheaded by Strategic Objectives are its "fashion with compassion" effort, in which Cashmere bathroom tissue raised awareness for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, and the 2011 Koodonation launch for Koodo Mobile, which promotes change through the social web by activating volunteerism.

Fashion with Compassion: Strategic Objectives' high profile campaign combined bathroom tissue with breast cancer awareness.

Pfizer (Paralympics) and M & M Meat Shops (Crohn's and colitis) are two other established clients.

Asked how one would measure the success of a CSR campaign, Weinstein said you would see how many outlets picked it up, how wide an audience it reached and you'd value that reach by considering how much you'd have to pay to attain the same results through ads.

As far as Weinstein is concerned, CSR is here to stay. "It's not nice to have – it's a need to have," she said.

Surveys show consumers favour companies that practise CSR. Seventy-five per cent said they were likely to purchase products from the company when they agree with its stand and 13 per cent have actually done so, she said.

What's more, 70 per cent said they would pay a premium for products from brands that practice CSR.

Although they are an industry leader, Strategic Objectives is not content to rest on its laurels. There are lots of new entrants in the area, small shops nipping at their heels.

But Strategic Objectives has over the years generated goodwill that brings it constant referrals. Weinstein expects that to continue.

But looking into the future, she believes "the media environment is becoming fragmented. You have to be everywhere with your brand."

More focus will have to be given to social media, such as Facebook and Twitter. Or, to adapt what she said in another context, doing social good on social media – that's "PR with heart."

Israeli firm supplies Canadian Air Force

Compiled by CJN Staff

TEL AVIV — Orbit Communications Systems, an Israeli leader in the field of mobile satellite tracking and communications technologies, has won a two-million-shekel ($533,000, all figures Cdn.) order from the Royal Canadian Air Force for its airborne telemetry and monitoring systems.

The technology will be installed in planes operating out of the Cold Lake Air Force Base in Alberta, according to a report in Globes online, an Israeli business news site.

The system will monitor objects flying in Canadian air space.

Orbit president and CEO Avi Cohen said he expects to expand business in Canada for telemetry and monitoring as well as other applications.

Orbit's share price rose 1.1 per cent following the announcement, to 14 shekels ($3.73), giving it a market value of 126 million shekels ($33.6 million).

Jordan-mediated peace talks at an impasse

Avi Issacharoff
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Peace prospects with the Palestinians are looking poor, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday after exploratory talks aimed at re-launching negotiations ended in deadlock.

"As things stand now, according to what happened over the past few days – when the Palestinians refused even to discuss Israel's security needs with us – the signs are not particularly good," he told his cabinet in public remarks.

Netanyahu's comments came after Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas told reporters in Ramallah on Saturday that Israel was to blame for the failure of the recent round of meetings to re-launch direct talks. Abbas claimed that during talks mediated by Jordan in recent weeks, Israel had presented an unclear position on security matters and on the question of borders between Israel and a future Palestinian state. Palestinian sources said Israel's border proposal would have prevented the establishment a Palestinian state.

Palestinian officials said last week that an Israeli negotiator's verbal presentation on Jan. 25 of ideas for borders and security arrangements for a future Palestinian state was a non-starter, as it envisaged a fenced-off territory of cantons that would preserve most Jewish settlements.

Netanyahu said he still hopes the Palestinians will "come to their senses and continue the talks so that we can move on to real negotiations."

Israeli and Palestinian negotiators held five rounds of exploratory talks in Jordan, part of a push by international mediators to revive negotiations suspended in 2010 in a dispute over Jewish settlement-building in the occupied West Bank.

A Palestinian source said no more meetings were scheduled. Abbas has said he wants to consult Arab League states on the next move.

An Israeli official said Israel's approach to territorial compromise in the West Bank, captured in the 1967 Middle East war, includes the principle that "most Israelis will be under Israeli sovereignty and, obviously, most Palestinians will be under Palestinian sovereignty."

The official said Netanyahu had acknowledged, in a speech to the U.S. Congress last May, that not all Jewish settlements "will be on our side of the border" with a future Palestinian state.

The Palestinians want a state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with east Jerusalem as its capital. They say Israeli settlements could deny them a viable and contiguous country.

Last week, a bitter confrontation broke out between the head of the Israeli negotiating team, Isaac Molho, and chief Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, during their meeting in Jordan, after Erekat refused to let a senior Israeli officer present the Israeli position on security arrangements. An Israeli official familiar with the content of the talks said that, by all accounts, Erekat and Molho exchanged harsh words in front of their stunned Jordanian hosts, with the argument reaching its peak when Netanyahu's envoy asked to present Israel's position on security arrangements.

The executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) is expected to rule whether or not to continue the Jordan-mediated peace talks with Israel in the next few days, Palestinian officials said on Saturday.

Speaking on Friday, Wasel Abu Yousef, a top PLO official, said the Palestinian leadership will decide on the future of the fledgling peace talks in the coming days, following what he called their "failure."

The time frame that the Palestinians have allowed for talks with Israel in Amman under Jordanian auspices expired last Thursday, as sources associated with the Middle East Quartet – the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia – said last-minute efforts are underway to head off the collapse of the talks.

On Wednesday, Molho met with Erekat in the Jordanian capital for a fifth time, but at this point, no formula has been reached that would enable the talks to continue.

Erekat made it clear that because Israel has not presented its position on the issue of borders with a Palestinian state, from the Palestinians' standpoint, the talks have ended.

Abu Yousef said the PA is considering the possibility of accelerating reconciliation talks with Hamas, adding that "all necessary measure will be weighed in order to strengthen our people's resolve against the racist and fascist occupation and to increase popular resistance in all Palestinian lands."

The PLO indicated that it plans to bring its decision to the Arab League ahead of its planned Feb. 4 meeting.

Mubarak pleads for his life

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Deposed Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak sent letters to nine world leaders with whom he had friendly relations, requesting help for him and his family, the Egyptian Al-Yusuf newspaper reported on Saturday.

Mubarak asked for help in preventing Egyptian authorities from executing him, as well as aid in getting his wife and sons out of Egypt.

Such letters were sent to the leaders of the United States, France, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Italy and Lebanon.

In the letters, Mubarak said that his family members were not connected to the crimes he has been accused of.

Meanwhile, Mubarak's wife, Suzanne, went to authorities in Cairo and asked to depart the country to Switzerland in order to receive medical checks and clarify the situation of her family's financial accounts in Europe, which were frozen after the revolution in Egypt last year.

Mubarak is currently on trial in Cairo. The prosecution is seeking the death penalty for the former president, who has been charged with responsibility for the deaths of more than 850 protesters during the revolution that ousted the Mubarak regime a year ago.

The defence has rejected these claims, and a few days ago argued that Mubarak is still technically president of Egypt and therefore should enjoy immunity from prosecution..

Iran one year from the bomb, Panetta says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta says Iran is only one year away from producing a nuclear weapon.

In an interview Sunday on the CBS show 60 Minutes, Panetta said that "the consensus is that, if they decided to do it, it would probably take them about a year to be able to produce a bomb and then possibly another one to two years in order to put it on a deliverable vehicle of some sort in order to deliver that weapon."

During the interview, Panetta reiterated U.S. President Barack Obama's opposition to Iran's nuclear program and said that the United States shares common goals with Israel in its opposition to the program.

"The United States, and the president's made this clear, does not want Iran to develop a nuclear weapon. That's a red line for us. And it's a red line obviously for the Israelis, so we share a common goal here," he told CBS.

"If they proceed and we get intelligence that they're proceeding with developing a nuclear weapon then we will take whatever steps are necessary to stop it," he added.

Meanwhile, a six-member delegation of inspectors from the United Nations' nuclear watchdog arrived in Tehran on Sunday, Iranian state television reported.

The team of senior officials and experts, headed by International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) chief inspector Herman Nackaerts, was greeted by several Iranian students protesting the IAEA's Iran policies, Press TV reported.

The students held posters with photographs of Iranian nuclear scientists that Iran claims were assassinated by Israel and the United States, as well as banners reading "Nuclear energy is our right," and "Stop Israel making atomic bomb."

Prior to the team's departure from Vienna, the IAEA's Nackaerts said that the delegation was looking forward to beginning "a dialogue that is overdue."

"In particular, we hope that Iran will engage with us on our concerns regarding the possible military dimensions of Iran's nuclear program," added Nackaerts, who headed the team along with Rafael Grossi, a top adviser to IAEA director Yukiya Amano.

Iran had said it would co-operate with the IAEA team during their three-day visit, but indicated it would not give up uranium enrichment, which it considers a sovereign right.

"We have always been open with regards to our nuclear issues and the IAEA team coming to Iran can make the necessary inspections," Ali-Akbar Velayati, adviser to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, told the ISNA news agency.

"We will however not withdraw from our nuclear rights, as we have constantly acted within international regulations and in line with the laws of the non-proliferation treaty," Velayati said.

U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta

There had been speculation in Iran that the IAEA team might be allowed to visit the Fordo uranium enrichment facility south of the capital Tehran, which will become operational next month.

However, sources close to the Vienna-based IAEA said the visit would not involve inspections of nuclear facilities, but would focus on resuming talks on Iran's disputed nuclear program, which the West suspects has a military dimension.

Iran has since 2008 declined to fully co-operate with the IAEA and denies it is seeking a nuclear bomb.

The visit could pave the way for the resumption of the talks between Iran and world powers Britain, China, France, Germany, Russia and the United States. The last round of talks in January 2011 ended without a breakthrough.

Referring to the possibility of a military strike by western powers geared at forcibly halting Iran's nuclear program, U.S. officials told the Wall Street Journal on Jan. 27 that the United States does not possess conventional weapons powerful enough to completely destroy Iran's nuclear facilities.

Bulgaria deported Greek Jews

JTA

ATHENS — A Greek-Jewish umbrella group asked a UN body to clarify Bulgaria's role in the genocide of Greek Jews when the UN commemorated Bulgaria's rescue of its Jews as part of International Day of Commemoration of victims of the Holocaust on Jan. 27.

"Bulgarians saved their country's Jews in exchange for the Jews of the other territories under their control," said a letter sent Jan. 26 from the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece to the UN Department of Public Information/Non-Governmental Organizations. "In the name of the historical memory of our brothers, victims of the Bulgarian atrocities in our country during the Holocaust, we ask you to include this small and 'untold' part of history in your briefing."

The Greek-Jewish group was writing a day ahead of the UN International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust, which included focusing "on the little-known role of the Bulgarian people in saving Bulgarian Jews during this tragic time in our history."

Bulgarian occupiers of northeastern Greece handed over some 4,000 Greek Jews to the Nazis for extermination.

The Bulgarian government of the time, which collaborated with the Nazis, took steps to protect its own Jewish minority.

Haredi army exemption to be reconsidered

Jonathan Lis
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Head of the Israel Defence Forces' personnel directorate Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbibai said on Monday that the IDF should enlist every Israeli "into meaningful service."

Barbibai was speaking at a meeting of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee to discuss the "Tal law," which allows full-time yeshiva students to defer military service.

"There is no dispute that the challenging security reality demands that we enlist everyone into meaningful service," Barbibai said.

According to Barbibai, one out of every four Israeli men and almost half of Israeli women are not drafted into military or national service. "These statistics indicate a need to conduct a thorough re-evaluation of the universal requirement to serve and equal distribution of the burden [of service]."

National Economic Council head Eugene Kandel, who represented the government in the discussion, took issue with Barbibai's statements, claiming the IDF would have difficulty absorbing additional haredi conscripts.

According to official IDF statistics presented by Kandel, the number of haredi conscripts to the IDF rose from 288 in 2007 to 1,282 in 2011, which he said exceeded goals set by the government.

Committee chairman Shaul Mofaz (Kadima) criticized the law and called to abandon it in its present form. According to Mofaz, only half of the young people of draft age in Israel are actually drafted into service, and the number is expected to fall to 40 per cent by 2020.

"We cannot accept the norm that the peoples' army will become the army of half the people and, in eight years, the army of the minority of the people," he said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told a Likud faction meeting Monday that the Tal law, which allows haredi citizens to defer military service, will not be extended by the government but rather go to a vote in the Knesset.

According to Netanyahu, the Knesset has approximately half a year to find a "just solution that will not divide the country."

Canadians compete in Israeli Scrabble Open

Viva Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Pick a day during any month of any calendar year and no doubt you'll come across a Scrabble tournament taking place somewhere around the world. So it's not surprising that more than 40 players are expected at the upcoming Fourth Israeli Open Scrabble Tournament in Netanya, set to run Feb. 10 to 12.

"They're coming because they love Scrabble," says Evan Cohen, organizer of the tourney. He adds that many of the foreign players are coming "because they want to visit Israel and this is a good excuse."

There are those like Estelle Matthews – one of two Canadian players – who mesh the tournament with a family visit.

"I have been playing Scrabble for over 30 years," Matthews told The CJN from her Calgary home. "I much prefer tournament Scrabble to living-room Scrabble. This [tournament] gives me an opportunity to see my four grandchildren in Israel as well as enjoy a good tournament."

Others taking part in the internationally rated World English-language Scrabble Players' Association (WESPA) rules tournament come because Israeli players are so friendly.

"I've found the Israeli Scrabble contingent to be amongst the most welcoming and friendliest anywhere, with the same smattering of Scrabbling eccentrics that are found around the globe," Britain's Scrabble champion Mikki Nicholson said. "I can't wait to catch up with everybody and hopefully beat them all!"

Nicholson is one of 18 foreign players coming to Israel for the tournament. Along with Israel, Canada and Britian, the United States, Norway, Malta, Australia, Scotland and Germany will be represented.

The weather, of course, is another reason to attend. Israel boasts great weather in February, and the Netanya venue for the event looks out onto the Mediterranean Sea.

"The Israeli Open offers the perfect opportunity to escape the bleakness of a European winter and play international Scrabble in one of the finest settings of anywhere it is played in the world," says Nicholson, who played in the Israeli Open of 2010.

The game is a social one. And addictive, too.

It was conceived in 1931 by an out-of-work American architect named Alfred Mosher Butts. Today, the game exists in 29 languages, including Hebrew, German, Italian, Spanish, French and Braille. English is the language used by serious players and in tournaments.

"The game itself is very easy to learn. The more time you put in, the better you get. Some games you reach a limit and that's it. In Scrabble, you can always get better," says Cohen.

A linguistics lecturer at Tel Aviv University by day, Cohen is Israel's best-known Scrabble player. He's the Israel national Scrabble champion, he runs the Tel Aviv Scrabble Club (www.scrabble.org.il/), and he is one of nine committee members of WESPA, which represents the interests of international competitors and national Scrabble bodies worldwide. Cohen is ranked among the top 100 players in the world.

He plays regularly at international tournaments, and through his friendships, he has been able to give Israel's tournament prominence.

"We've become a lot more international. We started with five or six foreign players in the first Israeli Open. Now we have 18 people," Cohen says. "We're well recognized on the international calendar. We've had former world champions, we get top players."

On Jan. 1, the official club and tournament word list used by competitive Scrabble players outside of North America changed. Some of the new words include "guqin," "qin," "grrrl," "soz" and "voip."

The best Scrabble players learn words by heart. Cohen tries to find time every day to do just that. He says his best word is "the one that wins me the game. I don't have a specific great word."

But he does have a message that he hopes to get out regarding the Israel Open.

"I hope we get as many players as we can to our tournament. We show another side of Israel," he said. "It's a good image that we're projecting."

Israel congratulates Egypt

Israel congratulated Egypt on the inauguration of its new parliament, the first in the post-Mubarak era. "Israel extends its congratulations to the people of Egypt for its efforts to achieve freedom, democracy and economic development," Israel's Foreign Affairs Ministry said in a Jan. 25 statement. "We send the new parliament our wishes of constructive and fruitful work for the well-being of the Egyptian public," the statement said. "We trust Egypt will continue to uphold the importance of peace and stability in our region." A spokesman for the Muslim Brotherhood, which garnered nearly half the seats in the newly elected parliament, said Jan. 25 that the government would not hold any kind of dialogue with Israel.

Police investigate mufti

Israel's attorney general has ordered police to launch an investigation of Jerusalem's top Muslim cleric after the mufti quoted a traditional text that called for killing Jews. On Jan. 24, Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein asked Israeli police to open a criminal investigation into a speech the previous week by Mohammed Hussein at an event celebrating the 47th anniversary of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement. The mufti will be investigated on suspicion of incitement to violence and racism. In his speech, the mufti cited a traditional text attributed to the Prophet Muhammad that says, "The hour of judgment will not come until you fight the Jews. The Jew will hide behind the stone and behind the tree. The stone and the tree will cry, 'Oh Muslim, Oh Servant of God, this is a Jew behind me, come and kill him.'" No Palestinian leader has condemned his words.

Haredi men arrested

Three haredi men were arrested for assaulting a woman in Beit Shemesh. The woman was hanging posters for Israel's national lottery on Jan. 24 when the men reportedly surrounded her car, slashed her tires and stole her car keys. A stone thrown at the car hit the woman in the head. Police helped the woman and arrested three suspects, Ynet reported. Other attackers reportedly fled the scene and are being sought by police. The woman filed a complaint with the police. Beit Shemesh has been the scene of tension between haredim and city residents, as well as visitors, over the exclusion of women in the public sphere. The posters didn't contain any photos of women.

Spiritual journey of a Jewish-born Muslim ideologue

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Maryam Jameelah is renowned as well as revered in conservative and radical Muslim circles. A fierce critic of U.S. foreign policy, she hates Israel, rejects secularism and modernism and believes that western civilization and Islamic civilization are implacably irreconcilable.

A prolific author, she has written provocatively titled books such as Western Materialism Menaces Muslims and Islam Versus the West.

Long a resident of Lahore, Pakistan, she is the second wife of Muhammad Yusuf Khan, a leader of Jamaat-e-Islami, the progenitor of jihadi organizations. She regards practices like polygamy, veiling and gender segregation as ordained by the Qur'an. By all accounts, she spends her days thinking and writing, an intellectual who defends and promotes traditional Islamic values and culture.

"This lady is a true Muslim who came to Pakistan to join a true Islamic society," observed her mentor and adopted father, Mawlana Abul Ala Mawdudi, a founder and key figure in Jamaat-e-Islami, an organization dedicated to advancing the cause of an Islamic rebirth and the establishment of a pan-Islamic state.

Jameelah, however, was originally not a Muslim, her birth name having been Margaret (Peggy) Marcus. A secular American Jew from Mamaroneck, N.Y., she was born in 1934, converted to Islam before the age of 30 and settled in Pakistan to "escape the awful destiny that awaited me if I remained in America."

The astonishing odyssey of her transition from Judaism to Islam is the subject of Deborah Baker's uncommonly fascinating book, The Convert: A Tale of Exile and Extremism (Graywolf Press).

Baker, a finalist for a Pulitzer Prize in non-fiction, pieced together her story after discovering a trove of her letters in the New York Public Library. She began writing them to her parents, Herbert and Myra Marcus, from Lahore in 1962. The correspondence ended in 1996 when Herbert, 101, died in a Florida nursing home.

According to Baker, Marcus was a bright, nervous, high-strung child from an assimilated family.

"I was nine years old before I learned anything about Judaism, but once I began reading about the tragic history of the Jews, I was unable to stop," she writes in a letter. "My parents always tried to pretend we were no different from the Christians, but the Christians didn't see it that way. For a time, I'd rather have been born an Orthodox Jew. They, at least, never apologized for being Jews."

A person of faith, she explored Reform and Orthodox Judaism before attending meetings of the Ethical Culture Society, but found them unsatisfactory.

The prospect of a new Jewish state in the Middle East excited her. She was convinced that, with Israel's creation, Jews and Arabs would usher in a golden age of amity and cooperation.

But due to the Palestinian refugee problem, she soured on Zionism.

"What possible justification can there be to deprive an entire people of their homeland and rights as human beings?" she wrote. In a reference to the Holocaust, she added, "Hadn't the Jews just suffered such a crime based on equally specious propaganda?"

To Marcus, Jews had no historical connection to Israel. "And what was Palestine to them? Moses received his revelation in Egypt."

Having concluded that Israel's creation was an "injustice, plain and simple," she compared the Israelis to Nazis, disassociated herself from Judaism and wrote an unpublished novel about Palestinian refugees.

Spending more of her time in the New York Public Library, she discovered the works of Mohammad Asad, the Jewish convert to Islam who settled in Pakistan. She was particularly impressed with his book The Road to Mecca and was certain that Islam is a vehicle for social justice, equality and communal harmony.

She made these discoveries while struggling to maintain her emotional equilibrium. As a university student, Marcus had psychiatric problems and suffered a nervous breakdown. Dropping out of New York University before graduation, she was hospitalized for schizophrenia.

Marcus initiated a correspondence with Mawdudi in 1960, sending him a letter outlining the challenges Islam faced and clippings of her articles about that religion. "Margaret's remedies for the political challenges facing the Muslim world were uncannily similar to those proposed by Mawdudi's writings and speeches," observes Baker.

Highly impressed by her ideas and intellect, Mawdudi invited her to spend the Ramadan holiday with him and his family in Pakistan. He added, "When I was reading your articles, I felt as if I were reading my own mind."

With his encouragement, she converted to Islam, taking her vows at the Islamic Mission of America in Brooklyn and changing her name on May 24, 1961. She proceeded to immigrate to Pakistan as Mawdudi's guest. Upon her arrival, she wrote her parents, "I wanted to reassure you that for the first time in my life I feel I have finally arrived at a place I can call home."

Prior to her departure, Herbert and Myra Marcus had joined the Unitarian Church.

Though Mawdudi admired her as a gifted thinker and writer and related to her as a daughter, he developed doubts about her sanity. Ultimately, he committed her to an asylum in Lahore.

She, in turn, recoiled from his cold, authoritarian personality. Baker claims the suffering she endured during this period strengthened rather than weakened her beliefs.

Marcus had five children with Khan, one of whom died in infancy. She was not a conventional mother. As a result of a nervous condition, she did not nurse her children. And because she never learned to cook, the other women in Khan's household had to do the cooking. A recluse who never left the house except to keep doctor's appointments, she was interested only in writing books.

With Mawdudi's death, Marcus, hoping to be his ideological heir, churned out a series of pamphlets glorifying famed Muslim freedom fighters. Baker suggests that these pamphlets, published after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, condoned violence. Marcus insists that she wrote "only on a philosophical plane," and that Islam must be compassionate and merciful

Marcus' two sons, members of Jamaat- e-Islami's student wing, must have been influenced by her writings, having joined the ranks of Muslim fighters in Afghanistan. One wonders how many other young Muslim men imbued with Islamic fervour have fallen under her spell.

Israeli singer dedicated to keeping Ladino alive

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israeli songstress Yasmin Levy is dedicated to keeping Ladino alive.

"It's my life mission," she said in an interview from her home in Israel last week.

Levy, an international star who promotes Ladino through her concerts, will perform in Toronto on Saturday, Feb. 11, at 8 p.m. at the Royal Conservatory of Music's Koerner Hall.

In her only appearance here, she will share the stage with Omar Faruk Tekbilek, a musician from Turkey and one of the world's foremost exponents of Middle Eastern music.

This will be the 36-year-old singer's third concert in Canada since 2007, when she sang in Calgary and received a rapturous reception.

"It was just amazing," she recalled. "I'll never forget it."

Levy, who has made five albums since turning professional, was born and raised in a Ladino household in Jerusalem's Bakaa district.

Her father, Yitzhak, a Turkish-born composer and cantor who died in 1977, worked tirelessly to preserve Ladino. He was head of the Ladino department at Israel's state radio, and during his lifetime, he published books about Ladino.

Levy's mother, Kochava, a singer with Turkish roots who has performed in Ladino, is immersed in this dying language as well.

Known as Judeo-Spanish and Spaniolit, and sometimes referred to as the Sephardi equivalent of Yiddish, Ladino was spoken by Jews expelled from Spain and Portugal.

Their descendants enriched Ladino with words borrowed from languages such as Hebrew, Turkish, Greek, Bulgarian and French.

Yasmin Levy

Ladino was struck a near-death blow when tens of thousands of its native speakers in the Balkans were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

Survivors perpetuated the language in Israel – the country with the largest number of Ladino speakers today – and elsewhere.

By all accounts, about 200,000 Jews have a working knowledge of Ladino today. Levy said she did not know how many Ladino speakers live in Canada.

Although Levy fully shares her late father's love for Ladino, she is not fluent in it. "But the day will come when I'll dedicate myself to learning it," said Levy, who was featured in a 2010 documentary, Music Mon Amour, a German/French co-production.

Levy's musical interests were formed in childhood. From the age of six onward, she studied piano. At 20, she gave her first concert, which took place in Jerusalem.

Two years later, she made her foreign debut in Essen, Germany.

Recording her first album, Romance and Yasmin, in Ladino, Levy began singing in Spanish after studying flamenco in Seville, Spain, on a scholarship.

Since then, she has released two albums, La Juderia and Sentir, both of which have been in Ladino and Spanish.

She is currently working on her fifth album, which still remains nameless. "I'll know the name at the end of the process," she said.

It will first be available in stores in Europe in September.

Levy composes her own songs, drawing inspiration from Sephardi traditions, Spanish flamenco, Portuguese fado and even the lyrics of Canadian Leonard Cohen.

The themes of her songs turn on love and romance, the longing for Jerusalem and her own personal experiences.

Since her breakout concert in Germany a decade ago, Levy has performed mostly abroad, in countries ranging from Turkey and Spain to Poland and Sweden.

She toured the United States in 2009 and again last year.

Levy travels with her husband, Yishay, a member of her band. They have been married for eight years. Seven months ago, she gave birth to their first child.

When she is not on tour, she and her husband live in Mevaseret Zion, an affluent town high in the mountains about 10 kilometres from Jerusalem.

Though Ladino is an integral component of her repertoire, Levy is less than sanguine about its long-range durability.

"It won't survive. Ladino speakers are old, and my generation doesn't speak it. You find it in songs, books and archives today."

UNESCO, a United Nations agency, recently recognized Ladino as an endangered language.

Canadian screenwriter's film is an Oscar contender

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The most glittering event in Hollywood's crowded calendar, the annual Academy Awards ceremony, takes place on Feb. 26 at the Kodak Theater in Los Angeles. David Shamoon, a Canadian screenwriter, is likely to be in the audience as the Oscars, the golden statuettes presented by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, are handed out by a procession of movie stars.

One of the Oscar contenders is In Darkness, a feature film conceived by Shamoon. A Canada/Poland/Germany co-production, it is scheduled to open in Canadian theatres on Feb. 17.

In Darkness, Poland's official entry for best foreign language film of 2011, is competing with four other movies: Monsieur Lazhar from Canada, Footnote from Israel, A Separation from Iran and Bullhead from Belgium.

"I have no idea who will win," said Shamoon in an interview last week. "The academy is very unpredictable. But I'm relieved and grateful we were chosen as one of the finalists."

Directed by Poland's Agnieszka Holland and produced by Canada's Eric Jordan and Paul Stephens, In Darkness is set in the Nazi-occupied Polish city of Lvov. It tells the true story of an antisemitic sewer-worker-cum-thief who saves a group of Jewish men, women and children.

Based on a book by Robert Marshall and nominated for three Genie Awards, it opened to favourable reviews in New York last December and has already broken box-office records in Poland.

Still more amazing, this was the first script Shamoon – a 64-year-old former advertising art director – has managed to turn into a film.

Shamoon embarked on his quest after reading a 2003 Toronto Star article about a book by Sir Martin Gilbert on Righteous Gentiles. The article mentioned Leopold Socha, who hid Jews in exchange for payment. Eventually, he refused to be paid as humanity triumphed over opportunism.

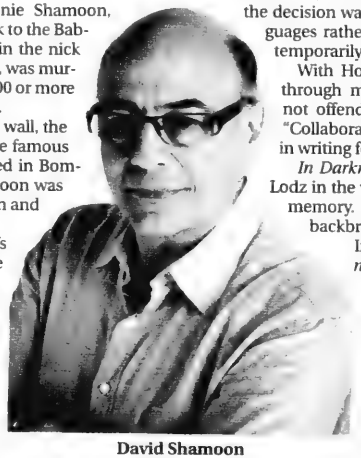
"I immediately wanted to know more about this person," explained Shamoon. "I was intrigued by the idea that a petty criminal, or anyone else for that matter, would risk his life and his family's to help complete strangers. It seemed so unlikely."

Shamoon's next step was to read Marshall's In the Sewers of Lvov, which electrified him. Brimming with drama, it had all the ingredients of a compelling story: a flawed hero, suspense, romance and tragedy.

And as the son of Iraqi Jews who had survived a 1941 pogrom in Baghdad known as the Farhud, he was deeply touched by Marshall's tale.

"My parents, Joseph and Leonie Shamoon, who could trace their ancestry back to the Babylonian captivity, were saved just in the nick of time." His father's aunt, however, was murdered in her bathtub. Altogether, 200 or more Jews were killed during the Farhud.

Reading the handwriting on the wall, the Shamoons, who were related to the famous Sassoon clan, left Iraq and resettled in Bombay (Mumbai), India, where Shamoon was born. He arrived in Toronto, via Iran and the United States, in 1970.



David Shamoon

Deeply impressed by Marshall's account, Shamoon optioned the film rights to his book, researched the period and, in a risky move, wrote a script on spec.

The screenplay emphasized the universal human drama rather than the Holocaust itself. "I asked myself, 'What makes someone, like Socha, do the right thing?'"

Wary of being saddled with a maudlin script, Shamoon decided not to sugar-coat any of the Jewish characters, some of whom had been con artists and black marketers. He also limited the portrayal of atrocities, assuming that audiences were inured to wanton Nazi violence.

In 2005, he presented the first draft to Jordan and Stephens of The Film Works in Toronto.

Believing it could be transformed into a powerful film, they worked on it with Shamoon for two years, polishing and refining the script. Then they showed it to Holland, who had directed Europa, Europa, a film that unfolded during the Holocaust, and whom Shamoon admired as an accomplished cinematic storyteller.

Holland agreed to direct only if In Darkness was told in the original languages: Polish, German, Yiddish and Ukrainian. "I really wanted it to be in English," recalled Shamoon. "But she was right. Her commitment to authenticity was unwavering."

Until then, Telefilm had provided funding. But once the decision was made to shoot in four foreign languages rather than English, Telefilm pulled out, temporarily imperilling the entire project.

With Holland at the helm, the script went through many more rewrites. Shamoon was not offended by her demands. As he put it, "Collaborating with her was like getting a PhD in writing for the movies."

In Darkness was shot in Berlin, Leipzig and Lodz in the winter of 2010, one of the coldest in memory. "It was incredibly hard, sometimes backbreaking work," he noted.

In retrospect, the making of In Darkness was extremely difficult on every possible level, from acquiring financing to shooting it on location under taxing conditions, he observed

Definitely a shoestring production, it cost $6 to $7 million, a pittance by Hollywood standards. "Holland had to use every trick in her playbook to make it as terrific as it is," said Shamoon, whose next movie, Taking Off, a comedy about a duelling couple on a road trip, is due to be shot in Los Angeles in the early autumn.

For now, though, Shamoon is focusing on In Darkness.

"My main hope is that Socha's example will inspire others as much as it has inspired me. He was no saint, but an ordinary man who made some crucial decisions that led to extraordinary deeds."

Can I really date a guy who wears a YARMULKE?
A Comedy by Amy Hoison-Schwartz
Canadian Première
February 25 – March 11, 2012 directed by Ari Weisberg
Eleanor, just back from a disastrous Birthright trip and a broken relationship, is thrust into a new relationship with Aaron. He's a doctor, he's got the brains, the looks, the wit... but wait! He's got a serious case of Zionism and an affinity to religion.
Can Eleanor, whose secular brand of Judaism might include the occasional latke see past his yarmulke to find her true love?
Featuring: Jada Rifkin, Adrianna Prosser, Jesse Nerenberg*, Scott Leaver*, Reva Lawry*, and Ron Boyd
*by special arrangement with Canadian Actors' Equity Association

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

FAMED LONDON AUCTION HOUSE PREPARING FOR SALE OF ISRAELI ART

Bonhams, the large London-based auction house that was founded in 1793, is preparing for its second sale of Israeli art with a collection of works made by new arrivals to Israel from Europe.

Leading the sale is Les Oliviers, an oil painting by Reuven Rubin (Israeli, 1893-1974), the Romanian émigré who became Israel's first ambassador to Romania. It is expected to fetch between 75,000 and 100,000 pounds.

Another item for sale is the watercolour The Approach to Mount Sinai by British painter David Roberts (1796-1864). The piece, which is dated and inscribed "Mount Sinai, Feb. 17th 1839," is estimated to sell for between 25,000 and 35,000 pounds.

The sale takes place on Feb. 29. For details, visit the website www.bonhams.com.

Zero Hour* Returns: Zero Hour, the hit show written by and starring Jim Brochu, returns to Toronto, producers Lia and Dana Matthow announced last week. The heart of the show, which has won top awards from New York to Los Angeles, is Brochu's extraordinary impersonation of actor Zero Mostel as he tells the backstory of Mostel's life.

"After a while, you stop caring whether a particular line is Brochu's or Mostel's; all you know is that you've been privy to the work of a great comedian," The New Yorker commented. Bathurst Street Theatre, Feb. 8 to March 11. www.Ticketmaster.ca, 1-855-985- 2787.

Israeli movie and Holocaust film up for Oscar award

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Two Jewish-themed movies were nominated for the foreign-language Oscar award last week.

Israel's Footnote and Poland's In Darkness, which both screened at last September's Toronto International Film Festival, will be in tough competition against Iran's Golden Globe-winning, A Separation, which is considered the favourite.

Joseph Cedar's Footnote received strong critical acclaim at last September's festival and won best screenplay award at the Cannes film festival.

Taking place mostly at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Footnote turns on Eliezer Shkolnik, stoically played by Shlomo Bar Aba, a Talmud scholar and his son, Uriel, who has followed in his footsteps.

Footnote, The CJN reported last September, is everything a movie of superior quality should be. The dialogue sparkles, and the actors perform with energy, grace and precision.

Cedar has made four feature films, and all were chosen as Israel's entries in the Oscar competitions. In 2007, Beaufort was among the five Academy Award finalists.

Agnieszka Holland's In Darkness is a raw, visceral, unsettling descent into the dark maw of the Holocaust.

Based on a true story, and adapted by David Shamoon from Robert Marshall's book In the Sewers of Lvov, In Darkness takes place over a 14-month period in Nazi-occupied Lvov, a city in Poland inhabited by Poles, Ukrainians and Jews.

As the Nazis impose their reign of terror, a Polish sewer worker stumbles upon a small group of Jews who've descended into the subterranean depths to save themselves in advance of the liquidation of the city's ghetto.

In Darkness is scheduled to open in cinemas on Feb. 17.

Along with Asghar Farhadi's A Separation, Footnote and In Darkness, the other movies nominated in the foreign-language category are Canada's Monsieur Lazhar, from director Philippe Falardeau, and Belgium's Bullhead, from director Michael Roskam. The awards ceremony takes place Feb. 26.

Singer of new Yiddish music reaps rewards

Dorothy Lichtblau
Special to The CJN

Last year was very rewarding for Toronto singer-songwriter Lenka Lichtenberg.

Her song Peace Is the Only Way, won an Ontario Council of Folk Festivals Award, and her latest CD, Fray (Free), received the Canadian Porcupine Musique de la Monde Award. She was also nominated for a Canadian Folk Music Award (CFMA) in the category of World Music Solo Artist for her CD Fray.

The recognition gives me "a warm fuzzy feeling because it tells me that I'm not just writing for myself but for others as well," Lichtenberg says. "Being a singer-songwriter of new Yiddish music places me in an unusual category. My work is not an easy sell."

The awards not only affirm her musicianship but also her decision to create songs that unite Yiddish words with melodies rooted in the Middle East and India. She sees her mission to contribute to the continuation of Yiddish culture, partly to commemorate the family that she never knew but mostly to make Yiddish a vital element of the 21st century. "I'm not the only one or the first doing this kind of work, but there aren't many of us," says Lichtenberg.

Lichtenberg's passion for Yiddish did not develop until she was well into adulthood. Born in Prague, in Communist Czechoslovakia, she did not learn she was Jewish until she was about eight years old. Her mother, a child survivor of the concentration camp at Theresienstadt, lost nearly all of her family during the Holocaust and most of her ties to Judaism.

On the other hand, music has been part of Lichtenberg's life from her early years. "My mother says I always sang," Lichtenberg says.

From about nine years of age until she grew too tall for the role, Lichtenberg starred at Prague's renowned musical theatre, Semafor, opposite Czech icon Jiri Suchy. In her teens, she studied at the Prague Music Conservatory. Shortly after she left Czechoslovakia "to find a country where I could feel free."

Licthenberg settled in Canada, initially in British Columbia where she worked as a lounge singer at clubs and on cruise lines, had a stint as a vocalist with a rock band and completed her undergraduate degree at the University of British Columbia.

She also embarked on closer explorations of Judaism, which she says brought her to a more profound understanding of what occurred during the Holocaust. However, it was during her 1987 trip to Israel that she was inspired to commit to performing and writing Yiddish music.

Back in Canada, she immersed herself in academic and musical studies of the songs and styles of the tradition, completing a thesis on Yiddish music of the Holocaust to earn a master's degree in ethnomusicology at York University in 1993.

In the mid-1990s, married and the mother of young children, Lichtenberg dedicated most of her time to her family. Yet, the petite dynamo squeezed in as many local gigs as her responsibilities allowed. "I think I played in almost every Jewish community building in Toronto," she recounts.

As her three children became more independent, she reconnected with the world of Yiddish music, and since the late 1990s, her creative output has been in full gear.

Her early CDs reflected a mixture of folk and world-music traditions. But it was her 2006 CD, Pashtes (Simplicity), Lichtenberg's third, which marked a clear turn to new Yiddish compositions. Influenced by the work of Israeli singer Chava Alberstein and graced with an opportunity to work with Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch, she began weaving modern Yiddish poetry into innovative interpretations of global music.

Around 2004, she began a relationship with Yiddish swing music. Urged by vocalist Isabel Fryszberg to partner in the creation of a playful update of 1940s-50s girl groups such as the Barry Sisters, Lichtenberg became the co-founder of the Sisters of Sheynville. In the ensuing years, the all-women band garnered a strong following and a CFMA award.

Last year, Lichtenberg amicably parted with the Sisters of Sheynville to gain time to develop Yiddish-global compositions.

Giving in to her longtime attraction to the sounds of the Middle East, Lichtenberg conceptualized her next venture.

"I wondered what Yiddish lyrics would sound like when paired with the beat of the dumbek or the tones of the oud." After hearing a performance by Tasa, one of this country's foremost Indo-Canadian global-jazz groups, she knew she had to work with these skilled artists. And, thus Fray, her new band, was conceived. Lichtenberg co-directed and co-produced the band's CD with Alan Hetherington. "An incredible adviser for our project," she says.

Lichtenberg's other great love – cantorial music – connected her with a personally significant project. A longtime student of liturgical music, she regularly complements Shabbat and High Holiday services at Toronto's Congregation Darchei Noam.

In 2009, while performing concerts in synagogues in the Czech Republic, she felt that the walls of the buildings were resonating with the music. This experience inspired her project Songs for the Breathing Walls, a recording tour of several synagogues in the region of the Czech Republic during which she sang traditional and original Hebrew liturgy. Renowned Israeli oudist and violinist Yair Dalal was among the international musicians with whom she collaborated.

Along with the CD Songs for the Breathing Walls, she has produced a limited-edition booklet that she will distribute among the communities that hosted the project. The publication includes photos of each location and brief histories of the synagogues' pre-World War II congregations.

And, the seemingly indefatigable Lichtenberg is not pausing to rest yet. Her next dream is to create a songbook of her work for schools and community organizations. The reward for these efforts? Lichtenberg says, "I've decided that I feel best doing what to me is meaningful."

Maccabi Canada, JCC Chai Sports to partner

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

JCC Chai Sports and Maccabi Canada have entered a partnership that will expose young athletes to top-level competition competing under the Maccabi banner.

The partnership will begin in the spring with a soccer program that will expand JCC Chai Sports' house league into an academy that will offer a suite of activities, including house league, rep teams and enhanced training for those in between, said Alex Voihanski, managing director of JCC Chai Sports.

The rep team will be open to players aged six to 12 who will be selected after a tryout process. Successful candidates will receive elite training under the supervision of a new technical director, Deesh Bhattal, with input from Maccabi Canada alumni. Similar to a hockey select program, the young soccer players will be exposed to top-level competition in their age group.

Plans are to field three teams in the under-10, under-nine and under-eight age categories. The core of the under-10 team has been playing high-level soccer for a while and has hardly lost a game in the Soccer Academy Alliance of Canada in more than a year, Voihanski said. Coached by Jason Mausberg, the team will hold tryouts in mid- to late February and will play its first games in May.

The strategic goal embraced by JCC Chai Sports is to offer kids in the community the opportunity to compete in sports from the recreational house league level to an elite level, "and give them what they want," Voihanski said.

"We have a lot of kids at the house league level and we have a lot of kids ready to make the next step," he said.

Kids who compete for JCC Chai Sports teams may have a leg up on others vying for places on Maccabi Canada teams – but only insofar as they receive top-level training and competition, said Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher.

Teams operated by JCC Chai Sports will carry the "Team Maccabi" banner. "They want to be affiliated with us, because Maccabi Canada is considered the elite Jewish sports organization in Canada," he said.

Bacher said Maccabi Canada "wants to get more involved in the community." The organization will ask its alumni to run clinics and help develop the young athletes to their full potential.

"We're there to make sure these kids become the best they can be," he said.

Maccabi Canada selects the athletes who compete in the Maccabiah Games in Israel every four years, as well as in regional games, such as the Pan American Maccabi Games. JCC Chai Sports selects the team that represents Toronto at the summer JCC Maccabi (youth) Games.

"If you want to be part of these teams, you have to come to these organizations," Voihanski said. "We are the sole providers for the delegations at [these events]."

JCC Chai Sports has in a few short years become a popular destination for parents who want their children exposed to sports while competing with Jewish teammates. More than 400 youngsters took part in the soccer program last season and JCC Chai Sports expects to add another 250 in its house league and academy. JCC Chai Sports started with 35.

The organization currently offers a learn-to-play hockey program for 250 youngsters at the Pavilion, double the figure from just a year ago. The program is so popular that there's a waiting list of more than 50 kids.

Other sports are also popular: 200 kids play basketball; 50 compete in floor hockey; 50 play flag football, and another 100 play T-ball or baseball.

Voihanski, who also serves as general manager of hockey operations for International Scouting Services (ISS), said JCC Chai Sports is planning to develop hockey players in the same way select systems do and compete in leagues in North York and Vaughan. Jewish kids will play as the Stars of David – the same name as the gold medal team at the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championship – until fully transitioned to the Team Maccabi brand. They will compete in tournaments, travel to events, and play against private schools.

Ultimately, Voihanski hopes, the players will be able to show their skills at a JCC Maccabi Winter Games or perhaps a North American Jewish hockey tournament, though there is no specific date for either at this time.

Soccer players will get enhanced training and competition as a result of a partnership between JCC Chai Sports and Maccabi Canada .

Student points his lens at photojournalism in Israel

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

Ruben Salvadori started taking photographs about four years ago as a way to understand culture and human behaviour. Now, the 22-year-old Italian Jewish student is an award-winning photographer.

After finishing high school, Salvadori moved from Italy to Israel, to attend the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he majored in international relations and anthropology.

For Ruben, Jerusalem was a natural choice. "I wanted to be somewhere interesting and in a good university. I was mainly curious about human behaviour, and Israel is the perfect place to observe it, due to its very diverse society," he said.

Salvadori's studies deepened his desire to understand society and the people around him, and after his first year at university, he began to explore new ways to observe and connect with people.

"I grabbed a crappy camera and started shooting. I guess at the beginning it was out of the naive need to look for some sort of universal language since I was struggling with learning Hebrew," he said.

When his first experiments with photography yielded positive results, Salvadori began to take it more seriously.

He found himself especially drawn to documentary projects, although he said they are more difficult than many other types of photography.

Salvadori, the director of photography for a 2011 documentary called Inside Jerusalem, said that documentaries offer "deeper research into a specific issue, that forces you to [gain] a better understanding of what you're facing, as well as creating a stronger relationship between the photographer and the subject."

Salvadori is best known for his Photojournalism Behind the Scenes series, a set of photographs documenting how media images are produced and showing the quest for drama in photojournalism.

He did this by going to conflict areas in Israel and taking a dramatic shot of the scene first, using angles and a frame selection that would create an image of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that you might see in any newspaper.

He then also shot the same situation with a wider frame that included the horde of photojournalists who were present at the scene.

In the first picture set of the series, the viewers see a young Palestinian man with rags covering his face, except for his eyes. The man stands in front of a pile of flaming cardboard and rocks. He looks to be in the middle of a big battle. In the next shot, a wider frame, the viewer sees six photojournalists taking a photograph of the man, who is revealed to be standing alone in a mostly empty street.

The intensely dramatic, and esthetically pleasing, shot of the Palestinian man in battle is really just a posed moment that seems to have been intended to attract the media.

Salvadori explained that putting these images side by side shows the ability that photojournalists have to manipulate a situation with only a camera lens. He added that the public is accustomed to seeing these distorted photographs in the news and that less-dramatic shots showing the reality of the situation are considered boring.

This demand for drama leaves many photojournalists in a bind, forcing them to choose between selling dramatic photos that distort the truth and taking pictures of reality, which won't sell.

Though compromising one's ethics to get a foot in the door of the photojournalism business may be a tempting offer to some, Salvadori said shooting the Behind the Scenes series cemented his belief in the importance of thinking before taking a photo.

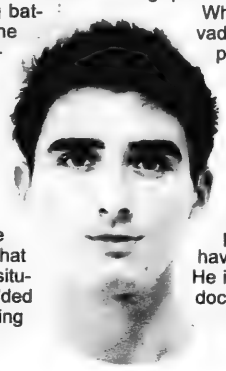
"The project definitely helped me understand more about what I want to be and what I do not want to be," he said.

Behind the Scenes earned Salvadori the Forma Foundation's Photodreaming Contest prize in Italy, and a video showing his presentation of the project received up to 20,000 hits per day when it was posted online.

Although many people praised him for his brave and revealing work, Salvadori found that some of his colleagues took the project as unfair criticism.

"Some photojournalists, especially the ones that do not conceive the fact that our presence has an influence on the events, took it as a personal offence," he said.

Behind the Scenes' popularity and the importance of its message made it one of Salvadori's favourite projects to work on, but the range of subjects he has covered includes everything from Tibetans living in China to Jerusalem's drag queens.



Ruben Salvadori

When asked about his influences, Salvadori said that there's not one specific photographer that stands out.

"I like to get 'contaminated' by different styles and photographers, and see what I can do to improve my work by mixing it with new ways to do photography," he explained.

Right now, Salvadori is taking a break from his studies and is in Italy working with two other photographers on a project about Italians who have found motivation in the recession. He is also putting together a multimedia documentary about a religious ritual of self-flagellation in a small town in Southern Italy.

For Salvadori, a picture is good if it has meaning and visual appeal for the audience, no matter what the subject is. "It has to reach the public. I don't like those pieces that only the author understands or feels."

Salvadori is planning to tour Canadian universities in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa later this month to speak about his Behind the Scenes project. Updates will be posted on his website, www.rubensalvadori.com.

Faith communities protect Earth

It has been a challenge lately to stay positive on the topic of the environment and sustainability.

On the economics versus the environment front, there are ongoing legal battles around pipelines proposed to carry oil from the Alberta Oil Sands to termination points in the United States and Canada. For both the Keystone XL and the Northern Gateway pipelines, arguments being made pit the potential of creating new jobs against potential environmental damage.

From Canada's perspective, changes in government policy specific to the Kyoto accord has effectively taken a somewhat faulty and less than global, greenhouse-gas (GHG) reduction effort off the table.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

In a Jan. 20 comment in the National Post, Canada's Environment Minister Peter Kent confirmed our current goal for 2020 is 607 megatons of GHG emissions, a 17 per cent reduction from 2005 levels.

Kent has also stated that the approach in Canada is to focus on a sector-by-sector basis, starting with the transportation and electricity-generation sectors.

Perhaps one way to bring some personal meaning to all of this is to focus on what each of us can do, either individually, as part of a larger Jewish community, or as part of a larger inter-denominational community around us, to reduce our consumption of energy, whether in the combustion engines of our cars or the electricity we consume, as individuals or as a community.

Faith & the Common Good is an interfaith network of religious communities who understand the Earth is a sacred gift. The common thread among participating faith communities is that each believes that their faith tradition is a key source of wisdom in a great spiritual quest, that of protecting and healing the planet.

Greening Sacred Spaces (GSS) is a program developed by Faith & the Common Good to assist faith communities in taking concrete actions to create more sustainable and energy-efficient places of worship and to educate members of the community about ecological issues. GSS helps people of faith live out the call to protect the Earth within their own context. It also provides an opportunity to save money, help save the planet and engage in meaningful conversations about the spirituality of eco-sustainability.

From time to time, there have been synagogues in the Toronto community that have participated in meetings sponsored by Faith & the Common Good. Some of these synagogues have taken advantage of the resources created by the GSS team that can help organizations become more sustainable and cost efficient. Any faith group that chooses to participate in the effort can also take advantage of networking opportunities offered by Faith & the Common Good to learn about sustainability practices of other faith communities and what motivates their actions.

It is important to recognize that we in the Jewish community who believe in sustainable living and sustainable operations of our religious institutions can plug into a larger community and gain value through dialogue and action.

RIBOLLITA (a hearty winter soup)

2 10 oz. tins white beans (liquid reserved)
Kosher salt
1/4 c olive oil
2 onions, chopped
3 carrots, chopped
3 stalks celery, chopped
6 garlic cloves, chopped
1 tsp ground black pepper
1/4 tsp crushed red pepper flakes
1 28 oz. tin plum tomatoes, diced
4 c shredded cabbage
4 c coarsely chopped kale
1/2 c chopped basil leaves
6 c parve soup stock
4 c sourdough bread cubes, crusts removed
1/2 c freshly grated Parmesan, for serving

Drain beans, reserving liquid. Set aside. Heat oil in large stockpot. Add onions; saute over medium-low heat 7-10 min. until translucent. Add carrots, celery, garlic, salt, pepper, red pepper flakes. Cook over medium-low heat 7-10 min. until vegetables are tender. Add tomatoes with puree, cabbage, kale, basil ; cook over medium-low heat, stirring occasionally another 7-10 min. In food processor with steel blade, puree half of the beans with a little of their liquid. Add bean puree to stockpot along with remaining whole beans. Pour remaining bean liquid into large measuring cup; add enough chicken stock to make 8 c. Add to soup and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer over low heat 20 min. Add bread to the soup;simmer 10 more min. Taste for seasoning and serve hot in large bowls sprinkled with Parmesan and drizzled with olive oil.

Fearing those who fear God

'Isn't that special?'

I mentioned to my friend Menachem that I always figured I would do something special with my life. He replied that everyone feels that way. I didn't know if he was right, so I started asking around.

I relayed my conversation with Menachem to a 30ish Russian waitress at a local restaurant. I asked her if she had always felt she would do something singularly unique with her life. She said "yes" and, in fact, had already "done two special things. I have made two immigrations," she added, in reference to her move from Russia to Israel and then to Canada.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

I considered what her "special" meant. Initially, I thought "special" meant an action that was "big to the world." The waitress challenged me on that definition, and I then understood what the philosopher Nietzsche said on the topic: "At bottom, every man knows well enough that he is a unique being, only once on this Earth, and by no extraordinary chance will such a marvellously picturesque piece of diversity in unity as he is ever be put together a second time."

With the knowledge that "special" may never be seen by most of the world, I asked other people the same question: Here are some of the responses.

"When I look at my children and grandchildren, I know that no matter how bad everything else was, how difficult the struggle was, I did something very special. There was purpose to my life. I guess I discovered the meaning of life and why I was put here."

My niece, Devora, who lives in Efrat, Israel, stated: "I think the main problem is that people aren't sure what is considered special. Is it special if you win awards? Is it special because it's specifically something you can do, or is it special because it makes you or someone else feel good?"

Devora began her life on a very particular (career) road and a certainty she would make the difference she desired. Her path changed. Today, she is raising five children and said with glee: "They are my life. I love them dearly. Every time I listen to them talk about their day and guide them, or every time I hug and kiss them, I am doing something special." She concluded: "I know every generation that comes after them and goes out into the world and does good, I had a part in. Now isn't that special?"

I also discovered that "special" can be defined according to one's background. Here is another response: "I went to CHAT [Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] and success was expected. It hurts to be a 'failure' in those terms. Also the burden of being the daughter of survivors [means] guilt also plays a role in making me feel like I have to accomplish something 'special,' noble, noteworthy.

"Which is not to belittle the good things I have accomplished, the kindness I hopefully have shown to people, the love and guidance I give to my children."

I think that special can be "big" and have a grand effect on the world, however, it can also be local, very quiet, and still play an equally important role in our existence. "Special" can be seen by the world or only by you.

Did you always figure you'd do something special?

"My great mistake, the fault for which I can't forgive myself, is that one day I ceased my obstinate pursuit of my own individuality." – Oscar Wilde

Clinical Pilates for rehab and more

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

By now, you've probably heard of Pilates. Perhaps you associate it with mats, balls and weights, but that's not the whole picture, says certified instructor Barbie Dukes.

Pilates is more than a way to exercise, she says. "In the hands of a qualified practitioner, it's an excellent form of rehab after injury or surgery."

"Pilates actually began as a form of rehabilitation," Dukes says. It was developed in Germany in the early 20th century by Joseph Pilates, a trained gymnast who worked with injured patients in hospital beds during World War I. "He began to understand to get these people strong and well, they needed to strengthen their bodies." Yet most were bedridden. How could they accomplish that? His solution: equipment that could work "in the horizontal plane," while patients were lying down.

Dukes, who trained at the National Ballet School, Royal Winnipeg Ballet and with teachers from Juilliard and the New York City Ballet before studying with the internationally recognized Stott Pilates organization, brings her interest and experience in dance and movement to her current practice. "I have been teaching movement education and neuromuscular re-patterning for 20 years," she says.

From her work with professional dancers, she's moved toward applying what she calls "clinical Pilates" principles to a general population suffering from chronic injuries, postural dysfunctions like scoliosis, joint health issues, osteoporosis and arthritis, sciatica and balance issues following hip replacement. Along the way, she took specialized Pilates qualifications in post-rehabilitation and athletic conditioning.

These days, her business, The Center of Movement (905-764-5791), gets referrals not only by word-of-mouth – though a "satisfied customer is always a great resource" – but also from professionals: physiotherapists, registered massage therapists, chiropractors and physicians. "There's a whole professional network," recognizing the value of clinical Pilates. "Orthopedic surgeons are really recognizing that the principles... are the same used in rehabilitation of orthopedic conditions."

More to a strong core than you think

In her home studio, equipped with professional-grade commercial Pilates equipment, Dukes first meets with clients and assesses their needs. "I will do a series of postural and gait analyses... mobilization tests and assessments." She and the client "decide from there what their goals are, and set up a detailed program which is suited specifically to their needs."

As Pilates himself discovered almost a century ago, people heal faster when they are moving and strengthening themselves, and Dukes says the equipment is key, especially the reformer, which looks a cross between a large coffee table and a rowing machine. "It really supports the body as it heals, still allows you to build important and critical core stabilization and neutral alignment which helps to balance out the muscles around the joints to decrease pain."

By attaching and detaching specific pieces to the reformer, Dukes can support injured areas while strengthening others. And because the workout is extremely low impact, it can be highly efficient and precise. "Those who have better core strength have better dynamic control of their movement and are less likely to sustain injuries."

For seniors, she calls Pilates "essential training for fall prevention." Some results have shown that it can actually help increase bone density, effectively reversing osteoporosis. Some of her clients have said that technicians at the lab where they have had their bone-density scans told them they should be doing Pilates. "These professionals know... clinical Pilates will actually increase their bone density, and that it is reversible," Dukes says.

Another surprise is its potential to help in breathing dysfunctions by increasing lung capacity and improving postural positioning. Pilates emphasizes breath control and breath flow, "the most efficient way to breathe while you're maintaining your core stabilization," and Dukes has actually helped clients increase lung capacity.

"I've had clients [with] asthma, they cough a lot. Their posture is just horrible, lots of tension in their upper body. I'm able to bring their spine and posture back to neutral. It takes away their pain and postural dysfunction while increasing their lung capacity."

Barbie Dukes guides a client through specialized rehab exercises with the reformer.

But you won't get most of these benefits just perching on an exercise ball. Dukes says she's "not talking about Pilates classes in the gym." What she does is personalized, with specialized equipment. "I'm applying the rehabilitation and therapeutic principles inherent in Stott Pilates to restoring optimal function and dynamic control through a clinical Pilates rehab program."

While you might think the goal of rehab is to get back where you were before the injury or operation, Dukes aims higher. Clinical Pilates can actually "help people recover stronger than they were before the incident... and it significantly reduces re-injuries as well... While working the whole body to keep it in shape, we progressively rebuild strength and mobility in the injured areas."

Emerging from closet of mental illness

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

As Mental Health Week celebrates its 60th anniversary this year, Barry Shainbaum is trying to do his share to reduce the stigma and shame associated with mental illness. The 59-year-old from Hamilton moved to Toronto in 1975 and was diagnosed with bipolar disorder a few years later. The disorder caused hallucinations and delusions, followed by breakdowns and depression.

"In 1974, en route to visit my psychiatrist, I had delusions that I was a police officer," he recalls. "I even pulled a car over." Once Shainbaum was diagnosed, medication and psychotherapy brought him some peace.

But his mental illness wreaked havoc with his life, causing him at one point to abandon his successful photography business, to consider suicide and to break the law.

Today it's been 22 years since he last required medication or therapy, a journey Shainbaum describes as one of psychological and spiritual enlightenment. "I do a lot of volunteer work now, as well as music, a radio show, photography and public speaking," he says. "Through my work, I try to bring some hope, joy and inspiration to people, and to remind them that through life's challenges, there are ways to reconnect with ourselves, understand ourselves and become mentally healthy."

Medication can be a crucial aid on the road to positive mental health, and Shainbaum says he is cautious to deliver "a message of responsibility. I try to tell people that while they can sometimes get rid of medication, it has to be done carefully," he says. "One problem people encounter is when they go off their meds and get into trouble."

His own personal journey taught Shainbaum that in a mere heartbeat, the best of times can turn into the darkest of times. "I also learned that life is typically full of joy, but also full of suffering," he reflects. "Health issues, both mental and physical, are part of life. The question is how we handle them. Do we overcome them, become stronger and even thrive? I have built four creative businesses, all of which emerged from my mental health transformation."

Before he could do so, however, Shainbaum learned first-hand about the stigma and fear of mental health issues that traverses all communities, the Jewish community included. "There can be shame and embarrassment, and the family member who suffers from mental illness can become the family secret," he says.

"A major hurdle I had to face when I became well again was how I viewed myself," he recalls. "At first I was ashamed and embarrassed, but then I decided, 'This is my life, and I'm not going to let anything stop me.'"

Since he's emerged from the closet of his mental illness, Shainbaum says he's received incredible support and encouragement. "Any time I'm in the paper or on the radio talking about what I've been through, people are appreciative," he says. "They come up to me and tell me their stories. They want to bring mental illness out of the shadows and see it as just another thing that happens to people.

"One in five people will have a mental health illness. The more people talk about it, the more the stigma associated with mental illness is reduced."

The busy life of working moms

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

I love to work. I have always found a rush in producing. Whether in school or as a professional, I've always felt energized and capable of doing more when I am busy. However, being busy takes on an entirely new meaning when you have a child. Just being a parent is a full-time job – sleepless nights, temper tantrums, and making sure your child is fed, clothed, safe and healthy is a full-time job.

While on maternity leave with my son, Ryan, I was in a constant frenzied state – he wouldn't take a bottle, wouldn't commit to any type of sleep schedule, was a poor eater and hated large crowds of people. Even baby music classes were filled with me singing while Ryan buried his head in my neck, a pleasure I actually paid for week after week for more than six months.

At the end of my leave, I decided to apply for a new job. I always knew I was going back to work, and when an opportunity to join a new organization emerged, I jumped at it. I remember calling my boss for the first time and finding myself sharing details about myself completely outside the realm of anything I ever considered "professional."

Had I lost my edge? As a professional fundraiser, my job is largely about relating to people. Would it be possible to have a conversation that didn't include diapers, bibs and sippy cups? Was I ready for two full-time jobs?

Starting my new job was actually far better than I expected. My boss, a mother of three grown children, understood and supported my transition and didn't make me choose between being a mom and being a development manager.

I put Ryan into daycare and jumped into my new position. As a fundraiser for Weizmann Canada, the Canadian fundraising chapter that supports the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel, I knew early on that there would be an opportunity for me to accompany friends of the organization to Weizmann's international board meetings, held on campus every November.

My family and I discussed and planned for this event early in my new position and we knew how we would make sure my brief absence (and wonderful opportunity to visit this incredible institution) wouldn't affect my son or his routine too drastically for the nine days I planned to be away. I planned and I planned, but what I didn't expect was to find out I was pregnant a mere eight weeks before leaving.

Being in my early 30s, married, with one small child, I always hoped my family would grow – eventually. In all of my planning, I had not considered that I might get pregnant again so quickly. We definitely did not try to have two children who would only be 23 months apart.

Nonetheless, the news of my second pregnancy was celebrated by all: family, friends and colleagues. I just wasn't sure about travelling to Israel. But after my doctor gave me the green light, I knew I could proceed with the plan as scheduled, and in the end, it was a wonderful experience. It didn't hurt to know that while on campus in Rehovot, I would be surrounded by some of the greatest scientific minds in the world – researchers exploring every challenge, from cancer to the world food crisis – and my passion to stay busy kept me on my feet for the entire trip.

Marni Brinder Byk with her son Ryan

Once I returned to Toronto, I realized how lucky I truly am. I have a wonderful husband and son, not to mention an amazing mother who was at my house daily to make sure everything was running smoothly.

I don't think there are any tricks to being a working mother of young children; I just think that the more support and understanding you have from your family, friends and colleagues, the greater you feel about both full-time jobs.

And for all of you moms and dads out there – good luck! Whether you are gainfully employed or working daily at being a parent, I hope you feel supported, respected, and admired for all that you are, and all that you do. I also wish you a good night's sleep.

Teacher puts Jewish focus on yoga

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

"It's very hard for girls who want to keep Shabbat or be observant to go to regular yoga training," says Kinneret Dubowitz, who instituted a yoga teachers' training course for observant Jewish women about five years ago.

In addition to classes that may fall on Shabbat or Jewish holidays, there are religious aspects to yoga, related to its Hindu roots, that are emphasized more in classes for teachers than they are in regular classes, she said.

Dubowitz – who teaches private yoga classes as well as classes for children at three Jewish schools – trained as a yoga teacher in the 1990s when she was less religiously observant.

While some people would argue that much of yoga is spiritual rather than religious, Dubowitz points out that there is a distinction between Jewish and Hindu spiritual paths. "The goal of Judaism is not enlightenment. It's [keeping] the laws and commandments of God."

In her classes, she focuses on aspects of yoga that are "more pareve, yet add a more Jewish spiritual angle."

At the same time, she brings in Jewish ideas. "There are lots of Jewish sources for understanding of breath," she said. "Breath is so essential in yoga."

She started teaching prospective yoga teachers five years ago in a class with seven students. Since then, 57 women have taken her courses. The first two courses were in Toronto, but Dubowitz noted that most of her students were from out of the country. Since then, she has expanded to New York and Israel, and there have been two courses in each location. She now has employees in both places. Sarede Switzer, a former Montrealer, runs the New York program.

"There's a big need for this in Israel," Dubowitz said. Her class there was started after she met someone from Toronto who had made aliyah. "She asked me if I would do a program there, so I asked her to help me organize it. We had 15 women."

In the Orthodox community, there has recently been increased interest in exercise and movement

Kinneret Dubowitz

A reintegration of body and mind

The class took place in Katamon, where Dubowitz rented a martial arts studio used mostly by secular Israelis.

Her 1999 master's thesis was on the integration of movement and Judaism. "I've been looking at the idea of why Jews are so cerebral," she said. In Temple times, she noted, "we praised God with timbrels and drums."

When Jews were sent into exile after the fall of the Second Temple, dancing was banned because they were mourning, she said.

Dubowitz said her work brings together like-minded women who are interested in the idea of the body and Judaism.

In the Orthodox community, there has recently been increased interest in exercise and movement, she said.

Historically – with the exception of the chassidic movement and its emphasis on physical expression of spirituality – the opposite was often the case. The Greeks and other cultures used to emphasize the body while "Judaism wanted to focus on the soul."

Now, she believes, "I think we're in the next stage" – a reintegration of body and mind.

Family physicians making a difference

— 'The unsung medical heroes slugging away' —

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Dr. Sandy Buchman, a leading expert in palliative and primary care cancer management, says caring for dying patients is "not a job. It's a calling."

He describes end-of-life care as "a journey" with the patient. "The relationship is profoundly meaningful for us and the family members."

The Toronto-based doctor was recently installed as president of the College of Family Physicians of Canada (CFPC).

Buchman says many family physicians are dealing with the complex problems of chronic diseases of aging patients. "Family doctors are the unsung medical heroes slugging away."

At the CFPC installation, he honoured Dr. Joe Greenberg, an older physician he calls his role model. "Dr. Joe, as most people know him, inspired me to go into medicine.

"I knew him as a child when he looked after my ailing grandmother. He made house calls to her and just about everyone else in town."

'It is important as Jews that we are seen to be contributing to the world in a positive way... This is our obligation. This is our commandment.'

Buchman, a graduate of McMaster University medical school, had a busy family practice in Mississauga for 22 years before turning to full-time palliative care. He began working at the in-patient palliative care unit at Baycrest, although he is currently on a leave of absence.

He also provides home-based palliative care with the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital, where he serves as education lead, and he is the primary care lead at Sunnybrook and Princess Margaret hospitals for the Toronto Regional Cancer Care Program at Cancer Care Ontario.

Buchman's journey into palliative care began almost by chance. In 1984, he was looking after his first HIV patient, who was too sick to be referred to an AIDS clinic. "A family doctor does not abandon his patients. In the early days, AIDS was a palliative diagnosis. We had to learn by doing."

He began getting more referrals for HIV and AIDS patients and developed an expertise in this area of practice.

Buchman works on a multi-disciplinary team of professionals providing home-based palliative care. Patients range in age from the frail elderly to children, he says, noting that there's a "tsunami" of people in their 50s who are dying from terminal illnesses.

When he is on call, Buchman provides 24/7 service to patients at home. "They could be having a respiratory problem in the middle of the night."

He says working in palliative care helps him deal with his own health and mortality. "The work is challenging, intellectually and emotionally, but it's incredibly rewarding. It imbues my life with meaning and relevance... It provides a frame of reverence. Time is limited.

"You improve your concept of self-care and you focus on what's important. You cherish what you have and you're appreciative of every day."

Family life is a priority for Buchman. "I organize my life around my marriage and my children."

His wife of 32 years is Gail Baker, co-founder, principal and head of the Toronto Heschel School. They have three "wonderful" sons, two of whom are engaged.

Buchman is committed to the concept of tikkun olam, the obligation in Judaism to repair the world.

Through his long involvement with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian humanitarian and relief organization, he has worked with the homeless in Toronto and participated in humanitarian trips to South America and Africa.

When each of his sons turned 21, they accompanied him on a Ve'ahavta medical mission. His oldest and youngest accompanied him to Guyana, while his middle son went to Zimbabwe.

He has also participated in a mission to Malawi sponsored by the Canadian Medical Foundation.

"It is important as Jews that we are seen to be contributing to the world in a positive way... This is our obligation. This is our commandment."

Buchman says he's not the only Jewish family physician making a tremendous difference. Others, he says, include Dr. Cheryl Levitt, a provincial leader in primary care cancer management, Dr. Val Rachlis – "he transformed North York General Hospital" – and Dr. David Tannenbaum, chief of family medicine at Mt. Sinai Hospital and now president of the College of Family Physicians of Ontario.

"They are part and parcel of a group of incredible colleagues who are leading the way in improving hospital and community care. I am immensely proud of them."

Women's 'Frumba' fitness program takes off

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When Bette Barmherzig approached Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue with the idea of starting a women's fitness class, she did not know that in just three years, she would have more than 600 women participating in her classes at four different synagogues across the city.

Barmherzig has been working in the fitness industry for over 20 years, as a wellness coach to help people put fitness into their lifestyle, as a fitness instructor and in recipe development. Drawing on this diverse experience, she created the "Frumba" fitness program, a Jewish women's wellness program that combines cardio, strength, toning, stretches, balance development and bone-building resistance training.

"I saw that a lot of people wanted to get healthier and wanted to exercise but didn't have the motivation or familiarity to do so. This program helps make fitness fun and takes the work out of workout, so women can look forward to the class instead of finding reasons to put off exercise," said Barmherzig.

She learned about the need for a program like this firsthand. In 2003, she fell off a ladder and her ankle was completely rebuilt. She had a hard time getting back into shape, but found that whenever music was on, she could push herself further. "A lot of the moves come from my own journey with rehabilitation. Music seems to almost block out pain," she said.

The class incorporates moves from zumba, salsa, yoga and classic dance techniques, against a background of

Bette Barmherzig

Jewish music – anything from Fiddler on the Roof to Israeli hip hop. It is only run for women, and it is designed to respect Jewish values.

What makes the program unique is the open, inclusive environment of the class. "A lot of friendships are created. Women from every spectrum of observance come to the classes and feel connected to one another because of the openness and friendliness created by dancing," she said.

"Our lives today are so full of responsibilities that often taking care of yourself takes a back side. This program allows women to socialize, network and recharge in one place.

She calls the program the "sisterhood of the travelling tantz," which means dance in Yiddish.

Participants range from ages seven to 70. "I thought it would be interesting to develop a fitness program which you can do with your daughter, mother or grandmother."

Barmherzig never thought it would take off so quickly and is thankful she can give women a chance to feel renewed. "It's so motivating when people tell me that I made them feel young and beautiful again," she said. "I tell everyone to leave their troubles at the door and I make sure they feel like they're on top of the world when they leave."

One way she does this is by selecting music and movements that are respectful of women and not degrading or demeaning. "We're working on strengthening our physical selves through the movements and our emotional selves by working together as women and using music that empowers us," she said.

She hopes to expand the program to more synagogues across the city and train more staff to offer additional classes, including a summer Frumba Splash program.

"It's more than just a fitness class – it's a sisterhood."

Living a gluten-free life

Shayla Gunter-Goldstein
Special to The CJN

When Lisa Cantkier was a toddler, her parents were devastated to be told by her doctors that she was dying of cancer. But today, she's looking pretty good, and feels great too, living gluten-free since she was only 18 months old.

In 1977, Lisa was hospitalized for nearly eight weeks, and doctors were unable to figure out the problem. Her symptoms: chronic diarrhea, malnourishment, hair loss, severe fatigue and failure to thrive. Doctors at the Hospital for Sick Children diagnosed terminal cancer. Then, someone gave her a banana.

A keen-eyed nurse documented how well the young girl tolerated the banana. Her problem must be digestive, doctors surmised, and ordered a biopsy. When the results indicated that little Lisa had celiac disease, her whole family breathed a sigh of relief – kind of.

Lisa's celiac was severe, and in the late 1970s, celiac was not a common diagnosis, nor in the public eye. Only one in 4,000 Canadians were thought to have it and there was much to be learned.

In the '60s and '70s, children were dying, diagnosed with cancer, as Lisa had been. Experts now believe that in many of those cases, the true diagnosis should have been celiac disease.

According to the Canadian Celiac Association (CCA), celiac disease is a "medical condition in which the absorptive surface of the small intestine is damaged by a substance called gluten." Gluten is a protein found in wheat and related grains that gives bread its structure and elasticity.

In celiac disease, according to the CCA, the damaged small intestine "is unable to absorb nutrients: protein, fat, carbohydrates, vitamins and minerals, which are necessary for good health."

About one in 133 people in Canada are now affected by celiac disease. In addition, up to 15 per cent of the population has some sort of intolerance or sensitivity to gluten or wheat. That number is expected to rise. There is no cure, but celiac disease is controlled by following a gluten-free diet.

Lisa Cantkier

Living a gluten-free life today can still be a challenge, but it's a far cry from Lisa's experience growing up in Toronto in the late 1970s and early '80s. Her parents, founding volunteers and members of the CCA, helped initiate the first celiac support group in Toronto. They were responsible for the introduction of the first gluten-free breads here. They used rice flours and made all of Lisa's meals and baked goods from scratch.

Despite being teased on occasion for her "weird bread," Lisa didn't realize how difficult it was to grow up gluten-free. It was all she knew, and her parents made sure she had a normal childhood. Still, there was no pizza, and no birthday cake for her at friends' parties. Lisa had to forgo overnight camp and certain school programs, as none would accommodate her special needs. It was almost like having a disability, Lisa explains.

Before marrying, Cantkier worked for over 10 years in education, mostly as an Ontario certified special education resource teacher. This led her on her path helping create accommodations for children and adults with special needs. "I want there to be accessibility, because I grew up without it," she says.

Lisa now works outside the classroom for a government-funded research organization, where she supports large-scale research projects that focus on government policies and programs in education, and for the disadvantaged. She's also a full-time wife and mother, and does volunteer work for cancer research and outreach organizations.

Above and beyond her other committments, however, is her "new baby" on which Lisa is spending every waking moment and all her extra energy: in December 2011, Lisa launched GlutenFreeFind.com, a comprehensive, user-friendly, gluten-free directory.

Lisa says, "with a focus on healthy living, the website provides accessibility to everything gluten-free, from A to Z."

The website has already created a buzz in the gluten-free world. Manufacturers and venues want to list with her, chefs want to contribute to her recipe section, and bloggers want to be featured on her blog. GlutenFreeFind.com is a member of the Canadian Celiac Association and the Celiac Sprue Association.

Lisa has been featured in local magazines and on Rogers Cable, and her list of testimonials is growing weekly, including from some high profile U.S. celebrities who follow her on Twitter and advertise on the site. Her Facebook page is active on a daily basis, with recipe posts and links to gluten-free deals in the GTA.

What Lisa believes sets her site apart from other gluten-free websites is that GlutenFreeFind.com focuses on every category related to gluten-free living.

There are currently nearly 30 categories, all free to navigate, with information ranging from where to buy products and how to travel gluten-free, to where to send your celiac kids to camp and where someone observant can find kosher gluten-free foods. Lisa is constantly researching venues, manufacturers and programs, in the hope of expanding the site and reaching out to other major Canadian cities. Her goal is to become a comprehensive Canadian resource.

All this is making Lisa an extremely busy woman, and she shows no signs of letting celiac disease slow her down. For more information, visit www.glutenfreefind.com.

Scientists discover parallels in their lives

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

A series of extraordinary coincidences that began before World War II brought two professionals together at a conference last September, and proved the truth of the old expression, "where there's life, there's hope."

In 2011, the Canadian Sleep Society made the unprecedented decision to honour two individuals with its Distinguished Scientist Award for lifetime contribution to the field of sleep research and education in Canada: Dr. Ben Rusak, a psychologist specializing in circadian rhythms, and Dr. Meir Kryger, the physician who founded Canada's first lab to study patients with sleep breathing problems.

Accepting the award, Kryger, who now lives in Connecticut, briefly mentioned that he was happy to be back in Canada, the home that had ultimately taken his family in from the refugee camps of Germany. "I was born without a country… Canada was my first home."

Rusak, also born in a German refugee camp, was startled: "I was sitting going, 'Whoa, what a coincidence.'"

After the presentation, Kryger says, "Ben [Rusak] came up to me, and we started to compare notes: we were both displaced persons, both families were holocaust survivors, both came to Canada."

The two men already knew each other professionally: As editor for The Principles and Practice of Sleep Medicine, known in medical circles as the "Sleep bible," Kryger had spoken with Rusak about a chapter he contributed. However, there is little overlap between their specialties, and they'd never talked at length. If Kryger hadn't made his comments, the two might have never discovered the parallels between their lives. "It wouldn't have come up if he hadn't made that offhand allusion to where he was born," Rusak says.

In their conversation following the ceremony, more similarities emerged. Both families came from Lodz, in Poland. "My father was a soldier in the Polish army," Rusak says. He was astonished that Kryger's had been as well.

"He was conscripted in 1939 and fought in the opening battle of the war when the German tanks came through." Kryger's father was in the same position: "It was spooky to compare notes."

Dr. Meir Kryger, left, and Dr. Ben Rusak accept the Canadian Sleep Society's Distinguished Scientist Award for lifetime contribution to the field.

Rusak was astonished to hear essentially what he'd heard from his own father: "they almost died 100 times… When everything got quiet and all their officers disappeared, everyone surviving in the Polish army headed for Bialystok, a border town where Russia met occupied Poland."

His father made the dangerous journey back to Lodz and warned others to get out. "He got… my mother, his sister and her husband to come with him, [but] most of the people… refused. 'The Germans weren't going to be so bad, they were civilized people, not like the Poles. Things would settle down.'"

Neither family remained long in Bialystok. They were deported to Siberia, then Uzbekistan. After the war, Rusak's family returned to Lodz, but word of the first postwar pogrom convinced them it was time to leave. They crossed Czechoslovakia and Austria into Germany.

"Meir's family followed the same route, settling in a camp near the German border."

Families in the camps applied to any country where they had family: Rusak had relatives in Tel Aviv, Buenos Aires, New York and Toronto. Canada came through first, and in 1949, they crossed the Atlantic in steerage to Pier 21 in Halifax, "where, ironically, I now live," he says.

They settled in Toronto, where Rusak grew up and attended university. After receiving his PhD at Berkeley, he was offered a position at Dalhousie University, where he's been teaching for 36 years now.

Kryger's route was more circuitous. "Our family moved to Israel. We lived in Tel Aviv until about 1953, then we ended up in Canada." He grew up in Montreal and attended McGill University. After three years of graduate studies in Colorado, he moved back to Canada to begin his pioneering work investigating apnea as a cause of sleep disturbance. "By the time I left, I had treated more than 15,000 patients." He is currently at Yale University.

Meeting Rusak was "very moving," Kryger says. "We were both extremely successful… yet we had both come from and were born into nothing. We didn't have a home, didn't have a country… it didn't look like we really had a future."

While he was growing up, his parents and others were reluctant to talk about what had happened during the war. "I didn't find out… until 1982 that my mother had another child who died."

Much of what he's learned came from a book his mother wrote with a nephew, available on Amazon.com, titled A Passover in Rome. His father-in-law, a World War II surgeon, also wrote his memoirs, which Kryger has passed on to his own children. "They're all very aware of it."

During a professional trip, Rusak actually returned to Poland to see where his family had come from. He visited Lodz and walked the streets and "probably the same tram tracks my father walked across in the '20s."

The parallels didn't stop with the previous generation: Rusak points out that both he and Kryger married blonde psychologists from the United States, both of whose fathers had served with the U.S. army in Europe. He marvels at their "very independent lives," which have intersected on so many levels.

Kryger, who maintains close ties with Canada, is now a proud member of Mishkan Israel, New England's oldest synagogue, which is renowned for social action, aiding the homeless, hungry and disenfranchised. "I've always felt and taught my kids… it's very important to take care of poor people." He credits this to his own background. "These are people that need help and I feel strongly that I need to do that."

For both, sharing the Distinguished Scientist award highlighted more than just their professional accomplishments: it broadcast the message that anyone can surpass difficult circumstances to reach the pinnacle of professional accomplishment.

"You can arise from a very, very difficult birth and childhood and actually succeed," Kryger says.

Eat well for a healthy heart

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

February may be heart month but looking after your heart and overall health is truly a 24/7 job. With the plethora of produce and lean meats in your local supermarket, cooking and eating healthfully has never been simpler.

Of course, it's always a good idea to be armed with a few guidelines. First, variety. Not only is it the spice of life, but it's the fastest way to a healthy diet as well. Eat lots of different kinds of leafy greens, cruciferous vegetables and deeply coloured vegetables. Eat fruit whenever you can, and eat it in season. When berries cost a king's ransom, opt for the frozen variety and you'll be sure to get your quota in.

Choose lean meats, and try to eat heart healthy fish at least twice a week. Complex carbohydrates such as whole grains and cereals as well as nuts and seeds have numerous benefits and should be consumed regularly. The kale soup featured below is full of good-for-you items. Kale - and other leafy green vegetables - have been linked with a lower risk of cancer, heart disease and osteoporosis.

Other studies have shown that eating just one daily serving of green leafy vegetables can reduce the risk of heart disease by up to 23 per cent. Kale is also blessed with vitamins C and E (good for brain cells) and K (great for your bones), and lutein (your eyes will thank you.) The fish dish found below will give you plenty of inspiration and variety.

And don't forget complex carbohydrates. The barley in the risotto is high in thiamin and fibre as well as numerous vitamins and minerals, including calcium, magnesium, phosphorus, potassium, vitamin A, vitamin E, niacin and folate.

CHICK PEA, KALE AND TURKEY MEATBALL SOUP

Not just a meal in a bowl, this powerhouse of a potage boasts a lean source of protein, turkey, as well as the presence of kale, one of the most beneficial of greens. Partnering with all of this is the cholesterol lowering properties of chickpeas, which also contain healthful amounts of potassium, calcium and magnesium.

Meatballs:

1 lb. ground turkey or chicken
½ tsp. each dried oregano and dried coriander leaves
¼ tsp. fennel seeds, crushed
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
pinch cayenne pepper

Soup:

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
3 carrots, finely chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. each dried oregano and dried coriander leaves
½ tsp. pepper
pinch cayenne pepper
1 can (14 oz.) diced tomatoes
4 cups chicken stock
1 can (14 oz.) chickpeas, drained and rinsed
7 cups kale, cut into thin strips

For meatballs; In bowl, mix together turkey, oregano, coriander, fennel, salt, pepper and cayenne pepper. Form into 16 one-in. meatballs.

In large Dutch oven, heat oil over medium heat. Add meatballs, cook, turning twice, for 8 to 10 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Remove to plate. Add onions, carrots, garlic and three tbsp. of water to pan. Cook, stirring to scrape up any brown bits, for 5 minutes or until softened.

Stir in salt, oregano, coriander, pepper and cayenne for 30 seconds. Pour in tomatoes, stock and 1 cup water. Bring to a boil. Add meatballs back to pan along with chick peas. Reduce heat and simmer, with the cover slightly ajar for 10 minutes. Stir in kale; cook stirring, occasionally, for about 10 minutes or until kale is thoroughly wilted. Makes 8-1/2 cups, 6 servings.

FAJITAS WITH LIME MARINATED HADDOCK AND GUACAMOLE

Fajitas lend themselves to a variety of fillings and this fish variation, with its Cuban and Latin American undertones, fits the weekday table beautifully. It only takes minutes to prepare but make sure to buy the avocado ahead of time so it has time to ripen. It's a good idea to have avocados on hand all the time. Although high in fat, it's a heart healthy fat, namely mono and polyunsaturated. In addition, a half cup of mashed avocado has 15 per cent of the RDA for vitamin E, 18 per cent for folate, and 34 per cent for panthothenic acid. It also contains small amounts of iron and zinc as well as a not too shabby eight grams of dietary fibre.

Haddock

3 tbsp. canola oil
¼ cup lime juice
2 cloves garlic, minced
¼ cup chopped fresh coriander
1 tsp. chili powder
¾ tsp. ground coriander
pinch hot pepper flakes
4 haddock fillets (each about 6 oz.)

In bowl, stir together oil, lime juice, garlic, fresh and ground coriander, chili powder and hot pepper flakes. Stir in fish until well coated. Marinate at room temperature for 15 minutes.

Transfer fish to foil lined baking sheet. Broil, 4 to 6 inches from broiler for about 7 minutes, or until fish flakes easily.

Fajitas:

1 large ripe avocado, halved and pitted
1 large clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. lime juice
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup chopped fresh coriander
½ each red, orange and yellow pepper, cut into thin strips
6 green onions, sliced
4 lettuce leaves
4 10-in. whole wheat flour tortillas

Remove flesh from inside each half of avocado; place in bowl. Add garlic and lime juice; mash until smooth with a few larger chunks of avocado. Stir in coriander and salt. Arrange sweet pepper strips, green onions and lettuce on platter. Flake fish. Divide guacamole evenly among 4 flour tortillas, spreading to cover most of surface. Place lettuce leaf over. Arrange fish, peppers and green onions over half of tortilla. Roll up to serve as fajita. Makes 4 servings.

BARLEY RISOTTO WITH ROASTED BUTTERNUT SQUASH AND SPINICH

You can use either pot barley or pearl barley for this risotto. Butternut squash, like most deeply coloured winter squash, is an excellent source of beta-carotene, a nutrient that is converted into vitamin A in the body. Beta carotene is also a potent antioxidant which studies suggest may fight off certain types of cancer and heart disease. Beta carotene is more easily absorbed by the body if eaten with a little bit of fat or oil so be sure to coat it lightly before cooking. All that is required is about 1 teaspoon of oil per person to boost your body's ability to absorb this carotenoid.

4 cups cubed butternut squash (about 1 squash)
2 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. salt

Risotto:

3 cups vegetable broth, preferably low sodium
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh sage
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
1 cup barley
½ cup dry white wine
1 bunch (10 oz) baby spinach, trimmed and cut into thin strips
½ cup grated Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 400. In bowl, toss together squash cubes, oil and salt until squash is evenly coated. Arrange in single layer on aluminum foil lined baking sheet. Bake in centre of preheated oven, stirring once, for about 35 minutes or until golden and tender.

Meanwhile, combine stock and 1 1/2 cups water in saucepan. Heat over low heat.

In large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add onion, garlic and sage; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes. Stir in salt, pepper and barley until barley is well coated. Increase heat to medium high. Pour in wine; cook, stirring, until wine is completely absorbed. Stir in 1-1/2 cups of the stock mixture.

Cook, stirring, occasionally, until stock is absorbed. Repeat with another 1 1/2 cups of stock mixture, cook and stirring occasionally until all of liquid is absorbed. Pour in last 1 1/2 cups of liquid; cook, stirring occasionally until almost all of liquid is absorbed and barley is tender. The whole process should take between 45 and 50 minutes. Stir in spinach until completely wilted. Gently stir in warm squash. Serve warm with cheese sprinkled on top. Makes 4 servings.

Healthy salads taste good too.

Living on adrenaline sandwiches

Shayla Gunter-Goldstein
Special to The CJN

Adrenaline is my friend.

Without it, I'd never get my appetizers done at 1:30 a.m. before my brunch guests arrive the next morning. I'd never be able to calm my overtired six-year-old after long holiday visits. I'd never manage to restrain my screaming toddler as I give him his asthma puffer and horrid antibiotics for pneumonia. I'd never be able to spend the night in the emergency room with my ailing mother, sleeping sporadically between tests and blaring announcements.

I'd never manage to do my work, run errands, attend doctor's appointments, pick my sons up at school and daycare before being charged overtime, and get home to cook dinner and do the evening routine with my hard-working and equally tired husband before falling asleep on the couch or at my computer while editing one last story.

Without adrenaline, I think I might just collapse from exhaustion. It has been an extremely trying year in our family. We are truly the sandwich generation.

The sandwich generation is defined as a generation of people, typically in their 30s or 40s, responsible for raising their own children and for the care of their aging parents. As older parents (I had my first child at 39 and my husband is four years my senior), we find ourselves handling the terrible twos and potty training, Grade 1 anxieties and vehement exertion of independence, while at the same time being concerned with parents who – in their eighth decades – are dealing with cognitive issues, depression, failing vision and a slew of other health concerns. It is especially difficult to see this happening to previously vibrant and enthusiastic people. Plus, we feel guilty about not being able to be "superhumans" – everything for everybody around us. It's stressful, to say the least.

These challenges are making me question how my life turned this corner, when I used to be an organized, social, "together" person, whom friends admired for my parenting skills and ability to still have fun and keep up friendships.

I suppose it's a natural flow of life. We all have challenges and obstacles. We all feel overwhelmed at times. We all know we should take better care of our health, eat right, exercise more, take time for ourselves, our spouses and our friends. How many of us truly make the commitment to ourselves and actually do those things? I know I haven't. I know I need to. Adrenaline is going to carry me only so far.

Lately, I feel like Tevye from Fiddler on the Roof, as he says to God, "I know we are the chosen people, but once in a while, can't you choose someone else?"

I also know, though, that we are truly blessed with a wonderful family, amazing friends whom we lean on often, employment, shelter, clothing, food, children who are usually a joy, general good health, and love that continues to grow. We just might need some extra adrenaline to help us through the rough spots.

Canadian remembrance at Yad Vashem

During his visit last week in Israel, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird attended an official ceremony at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem for the expansion of the memorial museum's educational facilities. Baird told the assembly at the ceremony that "Israel has no better friend in the world than Canada." While at Yad Vashem, Baird also laid a wreath at the Hall of Remembrance in memory of the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust. In the background from left, are, Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada; Paul Hunt, Canada's ambassador to Israel; Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and Robert Rozett, director of the Yad Vashem Libraries. Please see related stories on pages 8, 27 and 28.

Iranian military man aids Syria's brutality: report

Zvi Bar'el
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top Iranian military official is actively aiding the regime of Syrian President Bashar Assad in suppressing popular unrest in the country, a top member of the Syrian National Council said on Monday.

According to the Syrian official, Kassam Salimani, commander of the Quds Force, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard's special forces unit, came to Syria recently and is working in the war room that manages army manoeuvres against opposition forces.

Assad himself is reported to be constantly in the war room, along with his brother, Maher, his brother-in-law, Assaf Shaukat, and cousin, Rami Makhlouf. The Syrian chief of staff's authority has reportedly been restricted and divided among other military commanders.

The Quds Force includes 15,000 elite soldiers who have operated in Iraq and other locations and specialize in unconventional warfare on foreign soil. Among its other duties, the Quds Force is in charge of training and funding Hezbollah.

Salimani's presence in Syria serves as an indication of the kind of battle Assad is planning against opposition forces, with the Syrian army reportedly planning to wage all out war against the rebel city of Homs.

Rabbis Graduate

TORONTO — Rabbi David Seed, associate rabbi of Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation, and Toronto-born Rabbi David Wise, spiritual leader of Hollis Hills Jewish Center in New York City, were two of the first 14 graduates from a new year-long program that trains rabbis to help run the business side of their synagogues. The Rabbinic Management Institute's Certificate Program in Nonprofit Management is a joint venture of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies and the American Jewish University in Los Angeles.

UIA Name Change

TORONTO — UIA Federations Canada changed its name to Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA last week in order to "[clarify] the centrality of our partnership with the Canadian Jewish Federations and communities," president Marc Gold said. Since 1967, Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA has worked in partnership with Jewish federations and regional communities across Canada to strengthen Jewish life and raise funds for programs and services in Canada, Israel and overseas. The name change "is the beginning of a process of clarifying and revalidating the role and function of the national organization," its board said last week.

Rabbi Reinstated

AMSTERDAM — The chief rabbi of Amsterdam, who was suspended for signing a statement on "curing" homosexuality, has been reinstated. Rabbi Aryeh Ralbag of New York, who travels to the Netherlands several times a year to rule on matters of Jewish law, was suspended in mid-January by the executive committee of the Jewish Community of Amsterdam pending a face-to-face meeting to discuss his signature on the "Declaration On The Torah Approach To Homosexuality." He was among 180 rabbis, Jewish leaders and mental health workers who signed the declaration, reportedly initiated by Jews who say they've overcome being gay. He said he was wrong to include his position with his signature.

Mom Seeks Child's Return From Prince

Mother and daughter

PARIS — A Jewish mother in France won the first step in an international custody battle against a Saudi prince she says kidnapped her daughter.

A Paris criminal court ruled last month in favour of Candice Cohen-Ahnine's plea to "get back" her 10-year-old daughter, Haya. Cohen-Ahnine claims Haya has been held captive by the girl's father, Prince Sattam al-Saud, a member of the Saudi royal family, since September 2008. Along with having to return the girl to her mother, the prince also was ordered to pay monthly child support of more than $13,000.

"It's a first step in a long journey," Cohen-Ahnine's lawyers said.

Cohen-Ahnine says that when she agreed to visit Sattam with her daughter in 2008 after the couple had separated, she was locked up in a Riyadh palace and separated from Haya. Accused of being a Muslim who converted to Judaism – a capital crime in Saudi Arabia – Cohen-Ahnine was able to escape to the French Embassy and return to France. But Haya has remained behind.

Following the Jan. 12 court ruling, Sattam could face an international arrest warrant if he does not return Haya. But he reportedly doesn't intend to co-operate.

Cohen-Ahnine, 34, met the prince in London when she was 18. Despite differences in religion and nationality, the couple continued their relationship, and Haya was born in 2001. But the couple separated in 2006.

Protesters disrupt pro-Israel event at Western

Israel on Campus calls on student council to take action

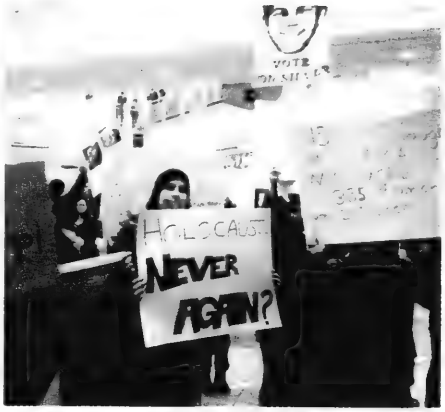
Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Members of the group Israel on Campus (IOC) at the University of Western Ontario are calling on their student council to respond to an anti-Israel protest that violated Western's building usage policy.

On Feb. 1, IOC organized a tabling event beginning at 9 a.m. in the atrium of Western's University Community Centre (UCC) to celebrate Israeli culture, film, music and food.

IOC president Sara Gurza said each student group is granted permission by the University Students' Council (USC) to present a display in the school's atrium.

"This was our day to have that space, and we chose to celebrate our culture. We like to create a very apolitical environment for the day so we can engage as many people as possible," Gurza said.



Anti-Israel protesters wore duct tape and waved signs at Jewish event at Western.

She said that at around 1:30 p.m., members of the campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), as well as members of the Occupy London movement, approached their display holding signs and wearing duct tape over their mouths.

The signs included messages such as "Israel steals 83 per cent of Palestinian water," and "You can't sugarcoat apartheid."

"They fully blocked our display so that no one could see it," Gurza said.

"We approached them and said, 'We're trying to celebrate our culture. Why are you protesting this?'"

Aubrey Chapnick, a third-year business student and an IOC member, said he tried to engage the 30 protesters in conversation, but they refused to speak to him.

"We asked them, 'Why are your mouths taped up? We want to talk to you. It's the only way the peace process can work. They wouldn't talk to us. They would only talk to the media," Chapnick said.

Hope as realism

From the editor's desk...

Last Sunday morning, Prof. Mordechai Kedar of Bar-Ilan University in Israel, urged a breakfast gathering of committed, concerned and caring Jews at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in north central Toronto "not to lose hope."

The scholarly visitor from the BESA Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan was referring to the possibility that the Arabs of the Middle East might one day reconcile to a sovereign Jewish presence in its midst.

Kedar is no Pollyanna peering at the Middle East through lenses of rosy optimism and gee-whiz whimsy. He is a hardened veteran of the intelligence service of the Israel Defence Forces and one of Israel's leading experts on the Arab world and the development of Islam.

He is a realist who listens to, reads of and speaks with men and women of the Arab world from all walks of life. In a sense, he is a high-reaching set of antennae picking up the signals from the region, studying and interpreting them for a society thirsting to drink from the cup of normalized relations with its neighbours.

He harbours no illusions regarding Israel's enemies.

Yet he told the audience of his contacts with Arab intellectuals, politicians and "ordinary" Arabs who express opinions and made comments to him privately that do not conform with the usual fare of Israel-as-Satan and enemy.

Kedar pointed out that it is among the religious leaders that the most blatant anti-Jewish and anti-Israel opinions prevail. For Muslims, Kedar explained, Islam "replaced" Judaism and Christianity, too, for that matter, as the way to Divine truth. Thus, Muslim religious thinkers and leaders would be hard pressed to publicly admit to the equal legitimacy of Judaism, lest they thereby negate the validity of the replacement aspect of Islamic theology.

And yet even among religious leaders, Kedar related, there are examples of individuals in the region whose theology increasingly allows for and encompasses aspects of Jewish legitimacy.

To be sure, Kedar emphasized, there is no revolution yet of positive or even neutral attitudes toward the Jewish state, but "there is hope," he said.

With the rapid advances in modern technology and ever-changing media, he suggested a new generation of young Arabs – perhaps the next one or the one after that – might arise to challenge the stifling, medieval Muslim orthodoxy that marginalizes women and disrespects other religions.

"I never lose hope," Kedar reiterated.

His plea to embrace the realism of hope has many points of reinforcement among Israelis and within Israeli society.

The Peres Peace Center in Jaffa, for example, is one of the country's key non-governmental organizations that champions coexistence and tries on a large scale to build bridges of trust among Jews and Arabs in Israel.

But there are countless such bridge-building efforts on a smaller scale that are mostly unnoticed by most of us who yearn so constantly and earnestly for peace between Palestinians and Israelis.

For example, a story appeared last week by Hanna Szekeres, on the student journalists' website NoCamels, about socially innovative programs at the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem.

The Bible Lands Museum is unique in the world. For it is solely dedicated to exploring the history of the Bible and the ancient Near East. It was founded with significant involvement by Canadians to house the private archeological collection of the late Elie Borowski, often described as a modern Indiana Jones. The artifacts in the museum date from earliest recorded Mesopotamian civilization.

Szekeres notes how the management of the museum uses its facilities and its treasures for specifically educational programs that foster attitudes of coexistence and communal sharing between Jewish and Arab schoolchildren. One of the programs is called "The Image of Abraham."

It is a yearlong program in which the young participants come from Arab and Jewish schools in Jerusalem. They are asked to think about the common elements in the Arab and Jewish culture. Specifically, they learn about the role of Abraham (Ibrahim in Arabic), as a patriarch in Judaism and Islam.

Yehuda Kaplan, education director at the museum, told NoCamels: "I think this project is a very modest attempt to make a change in our troubled and diverse community, by giving the young generation the opportunity to meet and learn about each other's lives.

"I hope that this opportunity opens the children's (and their parents') eyes to the idea that their neighbours have many things in common with them and that by working together they can accomplish great things."

Like Kedar, Kaplan is no Pollyanna.

And like Kedar, he understands that hope, despite seemingly slim odds, is the sine qua non prerequisite for improving life. In Israel, it is the only realistic way to proceed.

MINISTERIAL RESPECT

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, left, shakes the hand of a young Israeli soldier whose father was killed in a terrorist attack. While in Israel last week, the minister heard first-hand stories from Israelis aided by the Chabad Terror Victims Project. Beside Baird are Rabbi Menachem Kutner, , at left, director of the Chabad Terror Victims Project, and Rabbi Yossi Swerdlov, centre, director of Chabad Children of Chernobyl. Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn of Ottawa, director of Public Affairs of the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch, standing behind the soldier, helped co-ordinate the minister's visit.

Orthodox rabbi decries haredi extremism

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Almost 40 years after being ordained by a haredi yeshiva, a leading modern Orthodox rabbi says he is still very much in contact with the haredi world and that recent reports of marginalization of women by that community are "a reflection of militancy on the part of a very tiny minority that I don't believe represents the true values of the world in which they were raised."

Rabbi Jacob Schacter

Rabbi Jacob Schacter – the senior scholar at the Center for the Jewish Future at Yeshiva University, often described as the flagship institution of modern Orthodoxy – said it's "outrageous" that "a very tiny minority of very sick and disturbed people" are harassing little girls for attire they describe as immodest.

As well, he disagreed strongly with recent moves in the haredi community in Israel to force women to sit at the back of public buses and to prevent them from speaking at funerals and conferences.

"I think it's important for us to be able to benefit from the wisdom of all people... [If not,] we lose out," said Rabbi Schacter in a Friday afternoon interview Jan. 28 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he would speak that night and the following day as part of the synagogue's "Great Weekend" series.

In a Saturday evening talk on "The Challenge of Choice: Living as a Jew in the 21st Century," the rabbi said that religious observance does not have to come at the expense of individuality.

In the interview, he said that as a modern Orthodox Jew, he is "deeply rooted in the tradition and committed wholeheartedly to the observance of mitzvot." At the same time, he said he finds "tremendous value in the best of the culture of the world around us that I want to access and also feel an obligation to contribute to."

Since his 1973 ordination from Yeshiva Torah Vodaath, Rabbi Schacter said one of the biggest changes he's seen in Orthodox Judaism is "a growing segment of the community being more assertively halachic and traditional in behaviour."

Such a change is positive "to the extent to which it results in a greater commitment to the study of Torah and religious observance," but negative "to the extent to which it leads to the marginalization and rejection of those who don't agree with that perspective."

Rabbi Schacter said that YU is home to multiple perspectives. "I see tremendous respect on the part of each of the constituents. I'm thrilled beyond words to be part of it."

Before rejoining the YU faculty in 2005, Rabbi Schacter was dean of the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute in Brookline, Mass., which has since closed. In addition to smichah, he has a PhD in Jewish studies from Harvard University. He served as senior rabbi of the Jewish Center in New York from 1981 to 2000.

A proponent of interfaith and interdenominational dialogue, Rabbi Schacter teaches for the Wexner Foundation, which funds education of Jewish leaders. He taught one of its Toronto classes a decade ago.

The rabbi said he's not convinced by the argument that one "gives legitimacy to someone else" through dialogue with them. "I think it's very important for the Orthodox community to have a voice in the general Jewish community."

However, he noted that when visiting a community he is not familiar with, he consults with a local Orthodox colleague if he is invited to participate in an interdenominational dialogue.

As well, he said, "we need to speak not only to each other but we need to have a voice in contemporary North American conversation about the values we believe are important for humanity."

Torontonians mix it up to aid victims of terror

One Family Fund holds fundraiser

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Almost 200 people gathered recently at One Family Fund's first annual Mix It Up at Brassaii Restaurant and Lounge on King Street West in Toronto.

The Jan. 31 event featured hors d'oeuvres, cocktails, live jazz and a silent-auction shopping centre with 100 items, ranging from fashion and beauty to fitness and home décor products.

More than $16,000 was raised for the non-profit organization, which provides financial, legal and emotional support to victims of terror in Israel.

Samantha Margolis, Mix It Up chair, said she was inspired by her mother-in-law, Pam Foreht, to create the event. On a visit to Israel, Foreht met with some of people who One Family Fund assists and she decided the organization needed a higher profile in Toronto.

"Since One Family Fund has never done a fundraising event of this nature, we decided to create the inaugural Mix It Up in hopes that it will become an annual initiative to raise money and awareness," said Margolis.

Pam Albert, One Family Fund's executive director in Canada, said the organization wants to engage new supporters and "share our story of why we need to be there to help victims of terror in the aftermath of terror. They can become much more independent, but the ongoing support of our support groups, retreats and camps gives them the strength to move forward one day at a time."

One Family Fund provides "a tangible, concrete way for people in the Diaspora to connect to victims of terror in Israel," said Albert. "Supporters can come with us to Israel and experience the essence of what we do. They can meet victims of terror, look them in the eye, attend retreats for orphans and bereaved parents, and see first-hand why they need our help. It is about heart connections."

She said One Family Fund shows people that collective help makes a big difference. "Rockets are still falling in Israel, even though we do not hear about them every day. Israelis need to know that we can show our solidarity and be there for them. We truly are one family in Canada joining to help our Israel family."

One Family Fund's upcoming events include its first Israel Dragon Boat Festival on May 14 to 19, its annual bike ride on June 24 and its golf tournament on Aug. 9.

German hackers reveal Canadian neo-Nazis

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There's no need to man the ramparts, a new wave of antisemitism in not about to descend on Canadian society. Nevertheless, reports from Germany naming 74 individuals linked to neo-Nazi and white supremacist websites should alert Canadians to the fact that the "classical" antisemitic attitudes have not been vanquished.

That's the perspective of Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), who believes those named by a group of hackers in Germany are "the marginal of the marginal." Yes, they can do damage, and their agenda runs contrary to Canadian values of tolerance and respect, but there is no large scale social movement afoot that threatens those values, he said.

Last week, CIJA issued a statement saying that "we were disturbed" about the reported extremists. "Such toxic hatred disgusts the overwhelming majority of Canadians... Today's report should serve as a wake up call for all of us to remain vigilant in standing against hate, regardless of the community that is targeted."

CIJA was responding to a CBC story on the release of names of people associated with neo-Nazi and other racist groups. The names were made public by a loose coalition of Internet hackers called Anonymous.

They revealed the names, e-mail addresses and passwords of 74 Canadians who were linked to Volksfront and Blood and Honour, two extremist organizations.

Two of the named individuals, Alistair Miller and Robertson De Chazal, were charged in Vancouver in connection with an attack on a sleeping Filipino man, who was sprayed with a flammable liquid and set on fire.

Another alleged Blood and Honour member, Shawn MacDonald, has been charged in connection with separate attacks on a Hispanic man, a native woman and a black man in Vancouver.

Fogel said the "episodic events... remind us that we cannot close these files. We need monitoring systems and lines of communication with the authorities so they're halted and don't leech into the general community."

But, Fogel continued, it's a far cry from times in history when it was feared hate groups could insinuate themselves into legitimate organizations and influence society.

"I don't think we're facing that level of extreme antisemitism that is trying to shape the general and societal policies or ideas," he said.

How proud we are

Without doubt, the simultaneous visit last week to Israel by Foreign Minister John Baird and Finance Minister Jim Flaherty was one of the most memorable demonstrations of alliance with and support for the Jewish state by a Canadian government in recent history.

The ministers were in Israel for complex, multi-layered, political, economic, security and relationship-affirming meetings and discussions.

Both Canadian ministers, of course, met with their governmental counterparts and with Israeli President Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. But their respective itineraries also included wider consultations and participation in key institutional events.

Baird, for example, joined in a panel discussion at the annual prestigious Herzliyah Conference on regional security matters. He also attended the official ceremonies in Jerusalem of the expansion of Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies. For a significant part of his visit, Baird was accompanied by one of his Ottawa constituents, Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn, director of public affairs for the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch.

Flaherty met with Israeli industrialists, scientists and high-tech innovators. "I admire what has been done with the Israeli economy. We have much to learn on research and development and boosting innovation and productivity," Flaherty told a large group of Canadians and Israelis at a reception in Jerusalem. One of the tangible, mutually rewarding results from the finance minister's visit to Israel will be the attempt by both countries to expand the 1997 Canada Israel Free Trade Agreement.

In the moving ceremony Jan. 30 atop the windswept, fir-covered promontory of Mount Herzl, where the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Museum melds and blends into the beautiful landscape like tears in a painful memory, Baird proclaimed that "Israel has no greater friend in the world than Canada." It was a moral statement, not a political one.

In the curt, unembellished manner that is characteristic of so many Israelis, Minister for Strategic Affairs Moshe Ya'alon succinctly summed up the bilateral relations between Israel and Canada: "We share not just the same interests, but the same values."

Like all conglomerates of human beings, democracies are indeed flawed, problem-laden and imperfect. Thus, imperfectly but determinedly without cease, democracies affirm under conditions of freedom and the rule of law that the sanctity of human life and its preservation are our highest values.

These are the values that Canada and Israel share.

How proud we are, and how thankful to Baird and Flaherty for reminding the world.

Antisemitic column

Dr. Sawraj Singh's antisemitic ramblings in a column published on Jan. 7 in the South Asian Link, a leading Indo-Canadian newspaper, is reminiscent of some of the propaganda tactics used by the Nazis to incite hatred toward German Jews in the 1930s ("B.C. paper publishes antisemitic editorial," Jan. 19). Like Singh, the Nazis exaggerated the number of Jewish doctors, attorneys, professors and scientists among the German population, thereby increasing antisemitism and facilitating the Final Solution. Many ordinary Germans and others actually believed that the Jews ultimately "got what they deserved."

As a surgeon, Singh was once required to take the Hippocratic oath, whereby he vowed to remain free of intentional injustice, refrain from spreading shameful things, and to preserve and save human life wherever possible, among other things. His offensive statements concerning Jews and Israel, which can only lead to more hatred, violence and possibly death directed at Jewish people everywhere, violate those very principles that Singh once swore to keep sacred.

That Singh can hold such honourable and prestigious positions as the chair of both the Washington State Network for Human Rights and the Central Washington Coalition for Social Justice while expounding racist views is both puzzling and highly troubling. His expressed hateful and antisemitic remarks certainly show that Singh is part of an ongoing problem rather than the solution!

Remembering Kibur Arses

I am grateful to columnist Avrum Rosensweig for bringing to my attention the sad passing of Kibur Arses ("He was a shepherd," Jan. 26). I got to know Kibur as a member of the Canadian Jewish Congress executive and through the important role he played on our community relations committee.

Kibur was a tireless advocate on behalf of the Falash Mora, and as Rosensweig points out, Kibur was part of a CJC delegation I helped staff to Israel in 2000. I was beside him when he, with great passion and eloquence, spoke with then-prime minister Ehud Barak of the dire need to help the Falash Mora recently immigrated to Israel. Everyone in the room was greatly moved and came to understand how one man can move mountains.

Kibur was a man of great compassion. He spoke in quiet yet sincere tones in a way that provoked you not just to hear, but to listen. He asked little for himself, but gave so much of himself to the causes he so strongly believed in. Our prophet Isaiah tells us that the 613 commandments can be summed up in two principles: do justice and carry out acts of righteousness. Kibur Arses epitomized these principles. May his memory be for a blessing.

Haredi leaders must speak out against zealots

Yehuda Meshi-Zahav

The recent violence in Beit Shemesh and Jerusalem's Mea Shearim neighbourhood has led me to speak out against the so-called "Sikrikim" in the harshest possible terms, equating their actions to terrorism.

Sikrikim is the name given to a fringe anti-Zionist vigilante group, loosely linked to the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta, and are said to have been at the head of many of the recent violent attacks against innocent Israelis.

In my mind, there is a dangerous similarity in their actions and those of Islamist terrorists. And I do not use this comparison lightly – as the founder of the ZAKA International Rescue and Recovery organization, I understand only too well the horror of terror.

These haredi Orthodox hooligans have wreaked havoc through harassment and violence for far too long. It doesn't really matter how they justify their actions; often they are just bored and find excuses later. Whatever the reason, they cannot be allowed to go on like this at the expense of innocent bystanders, whose only crime is being in the wrong place at the wrong time, and at the expense of the haredi community, whose collective reputation and image are being tarred by their individual brush.

There would be communal outcry if terrorists dressed up as haredim, attacked a bus in Mea Shearim, broke its windows and injured innocent men, women and children. However, if haredim themselves do something similar in the name of religious zealotry, it is somehow condoned by a cloak of silence spread across the haredi community. This double standard has to end, and I call upon haredi community leaders who deplore their actions to make their voices heard.

The silence of the majority of our leaders has allowed a tiny fringe group of extremists to hijack the media into thinking they represent the entire haredi Orthodox community in Israel. This terrible generalization could not be further from the truth and is insulting to those of us who have worked for so many years to bridge the gaps of understanding with all sectors of Israeli society.

Yehuda Meshi-Zahav

As a proud 11th-generation Jerusalemite from Mea Shearim, I know the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta all too well, having been raised in their midst and spoon-fed their ideology through my formative years. I was personally arrested no less than 34 times for organizing protests against what I then saw as the evil Zionist regime. As I grew older, I realized that unlike my traditional attire, not everything is black and white.

My abhorrent view of the "Zionists" came to a sudden and drastic halt on July 6, 1989, when I witnessed the aftermath of an Islamic Jihad terrorist attack on the No. 405 bus en route to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. Hearing the commotion, I ran from my yeshiva studies to witness a sobering image that would remain imprinted on my mind forever. Sixteen innocent Jews lay among the carnage, including young soldiers, elderly Jerusalemites, North American tourists and Israeli teenagers.

Suddenly it became clear in my mind that if terrorists do not discriminate between Jews, then neither should I. Instinctively, I ran toward the mangled bus and began to help prepare the victims for burial. Unbeknown to me at the time, these were the humble beginnings of ZAKA.

Members of ZAKA inspect a burnt-out bus attacked by terrorists on French Hill in Jerusalem in 2002 looking for human remains. [Israel Sun photos]

I began to use my organizational skills and contacts to build a framework in which young haredi Orthodox men could volunteer and give back to society in a way that no other government body was prepared to do. We took responsibility for collecting the remains of terror victims for burial, attending one terror attack after another. Our volunteers received professional training and worked side by side with all of the other emergency services. Suddenly people began to associate haredi Jews, once viewed as outsiders who did not serve their country, as caring individuals fulfilling a critical role in society.

Today, ZAKA has thousands of volunteers from all sectors in Israeli society – Jews, Christians, Druze and Muslims. Our work has progressed into that of a UN-recognized, international rescue-and-recovery organization with branches across the globe, ready to deploy to any mass casualty situation.

Once I realized that the Jewish People were one, I began to understand our global role as a "light unto the nations." What better light can we provide than saving lives and assisting others in their time of need, irrespective of race, colour or creed? As our sages tell us, "All of mankind was created in the image of God" – not just Jews, and certainly not just haredi Orthodox Jews.

Authentic Judaism is not about highlighting differences and attacking those who do not share your worldview. It is about bringing the world closer to perfection, tikkun olam, working together for the sake of the greater good. As a haredi leader, I felt the need to publicly distance myself from these fanatics who hide behind the legitimacy of religious garb and spend their time desecrating all that is holy. Through aggression and sick media gimmicks, they seek to bully society into capitulating to their every wish and paint all of Torah Judaism as xenophobic and intolerant.

Authentic Judaism is not about highlighting differences and attacking those who do not share your worldview. It is about bringing the world closer to perfection, working together for the sake of the greater good

The only way to fight their hate is to increase our love and understanding. We must continue to work together as human beings, irrelevant of race, colour or creed to make this world a better place for generations to come.

Yehuda Meshi-Zahav is the founder and chairman of the ZAKA International Rescue and Recovery organization, which has 1,650 volunteers in Israel and international rescue units around the world that have assisted at natural disasters in Japan and Haiti and terror attacks in Mumbai and Mombasa.

Fighting anti-Israel week with historical facts

As some universities brace for the annual spring round of anti-Israel weeks, which falsely accuse Israel of the great crimes committed by South African apartheid racists, we must put this absurdity in historical perspective. For starters, the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians is a national one, not a racial one. The false comparison between what happens in the Middle East today with what non-whites experienced under South Africa's apartheid regime, dishonours the suffering blacks in South Africa endured. Anyone who perpetuates the big lie accusing Israel of practising apartheid or claiming that Zionism is racism is simply passing on Soviet propaganda that has outlived its maker. In that spirit, let's contemplate the African-American community's response in 1975 to the United Nations General Assembly resolution claiming that Zionism is racism.

Gil Troy

The day after the resolution passed, on Nov. 11, 1975, the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, the umbrella group of 32 leading American Jewish organizations, organized a noontime "rally against racism and antisemitism" in Manhattan. Many blacks attended the rally, and three important African-American leaders spoke: Percy Sutton, a famous lawyer and politician; Clarence Mitchell, a veteran NAACP official, and the activist Bayard Rustin. Many in the black civil rights community resented the Arabs hijacking their language and sloppily misapplying it to the Middle East.

"Smearing the 'racist' label on Zionism is an insult to intelligence," wrote Vernon Jordan, the then-40-year-old president of the National Urban League. "Black people, who recognize code words since we've been victimized by code words like 'forced busing,' 'law and order,' and others, can easily smell out the fact that 'Zionism' in this context is a code word for antisemitism." Jordan, a Southern-born lawyer, based his case against the General Assembly for "saying that national self-determination is for everyone except Jews." And he detailed Arab discrimination against Christian Copts, Kurds, Sudanese blacks and Jews – especially dark-skinned Sephardi Jews.

One African-American speaker in particular, Bayard Rustin, stole the show. Born in 1912, a Communist during the Great Depression, a pacifist and draft resister during World War II, a gay activist long before it was safe to be one, and a labour union organizer, Rustin coached his friend, Martin Luther King, Jr., in Mahatma Gandhi's ethos of non-violence. Rustin believed in "social dislocation and creative trouble." Nicknamed "Mr. March," Rustin helped organize the 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, meeting Daniel Patrick Moynihan shortly thereafter on the civil rights circuit. Rustin worked closely with Jews, championing Israel as a democratic sentry surrounded by Middle East dictatorships. Rustin knew how much Jews wanted black support for Zionism in refuting the UN's racism charge, and he happily provided it.

Rustin considered the resolution "an insult to the generations of blacks who have struggled against real racism." In his newspaper column, he described the "incalculable damage" done to the fight against racism when the word becomes a "political weapon" rather than a moral standard. Rooting anti-Zionism in the ugly intersection between traditional antisemitism and the Arab desire to eradicate Israel, Rustin quoted Rev. King, a strong supporter of Israel, who said: "when people criticize Zionists, they mean Jews, you are talking antisemitism."

Rustin and others also feared distraction from the anti-apartheid fight. Before the vote, 28 African-American intellectuals appealed to the General Assembly to bury this "extraneous issue." The scholars warned that a taint of antisemitism around the broader mission "will heavily compromise African hopes of expunging apartheid from the world."

Given his roots in the labour movement, Rustin resented the Arabs' hypocrisy, considering their traditional contempt for black labourers. At the rally, Rustin noted Arabs' historic involvement in the African slave trade. "Shame on them!" he shouted. "[They] are the same people who enslaved my people."

Tall and handsome, with his Afro sticking up and looming over his high forehead, Rustin ended his speech by bursting into song, singing Go Down Moses. As thousands of New Yorkers, black and white, Jewish and non-Jewish, joined in shouting "Let my people go," the black and Jewish experiences reached a harmonic convergence.

We need to learn our history. We need to learn the facts. We need to fight the apartheid libel with the truth.

And we need to challenge Palestinians to devote a week to celebrating their own nationalism rather than focusing on destroying Israel and denigrating Zionism.

Why I stopped kvetching and learned to love FB

I'm a new convert. I'm a "Facebook by choice" user. I'm going to learn Twitter next week. I've started a blog. What the heck happened to me?

For many years, I sarcastically dismissed social media, and everything I hated about it is still true: it can be a colossal time-waster – inane, narcissistic, prying and all-encompassing. I'm still not interested in knowing who else you're friends with, where you went grocery shopping, or how many times you played Words With Friends.

But everything else about it is also true: it connects people across the miles, it creates an eclectic community of friends of friends, it allows for sharing of big ideas, it fosters intellectual conversation across neighbourhoods, it brings you links to articles you might never read otherwise, and it often makes you think about things you aren't currently thinking about. But whatever its pros and cons, it's the medium of our age. It isn't going away anytime soon, and those of us who refuse to learn it are going to be left in the dust.

We boomers often feel frustrated and left out as our kids so easily navigate social media. It's their mother tongue. We are like immigrants who don't speak the language, so instead of admitting that and going to sign up for an SMSL (social media as a second language) class, we gather in little clumps and tsk-tsk the young'uns who speak it so fluently. We mock them and it makes us feel better that we "just don't get it." We are like old-world grandparents who are proud that their kids are part of the new culture, but refuse to really be part of it themselves, making excuses – "It's too late." We frown, we criticize, but secretly we look over their shoulders and wonder if we aren't missing all the fun.

The problem is especially evident in the Jewish community. Jewish organizations are late adopters. We wait to see what the newest trend is, and then, when it isn't new anymore, we tentatively put a toe in and try it. Often, it's just too late for whatever trend we have just decided is worthwhile, anyway. I remember when synagogues reasoned that they didn't need a website. After all, they had a newsletter, a phone chain and a secretary. Then in fear of being left behind, and in a "We're too late!" panic, many Jewish organizations finally threw together a website with lots of Jewish stars and menorahs and hoped for the best.

And what got jazzed up in a slick new digital package? The same old programming.

Organizations didn't take the time or allocate the resources to truly understand how this new media could be used, so these initial attempts were often poorly designed static brochures that didn't take advantage of the many features online communication offers. Not only that, but not believing that an online presence was a critical part of their modus operandi, synagogues and Jewish organizations chose volunteer hobbyists instead of professional designers to design their sites. Online presence seemed to be a last priority, so no one was trained to keep it up to date or add useful content. Within months, no one wanted to use the website, only confirming the naysayers who predicted that the whole project would be a waste of time and money.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

Today it is almost unheard of for a synagogue to not have a website or use e-mail. Now we're quicker to jump on the bandwagon and make Facebook pages for ourselves. But too many of us substitute cool new social media branding for great new ideas, deep connections, interactive learning and discussions, weaving a web of thought and action, and content worth posting. (And we're on Twitter, too! I don't think I'll be the first, but I'll sure be tweeting Torah study and not trivia.)

We need not approach this new language with fear. It's only a language, and as such, it's a tool. Remember, Maimonides said all language is metaphor. So is Facebook. It's a metaphor for the interconnectivity, interactivity, intertextuality, and intercommunal dialogue we could have if we weren't so darned afraid of the "f" word.

Islamic tide washes over Egypt

For as long as he was Egypt's president, Hosni Mubarak never tired of telling foreign visitors that he was a force for stability and that Islamic fundamentalists would be the chief beneficiaries were he to be violently overthrown.

In hindsight, he was right.

Mubarak, who is currently under house arrest on charges of corruption and ordering the deaths of about 800 protesters during the18-day uprising that ended on Feb. 11, is probably saying, "I told you so."

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

A year after his ignominious ouster, Egypt has entered a new, uncertain political era. With three rounds of free parliamentary elections having taken place, two Islamic parties, both of which are anti-western and anti-Israel, have emerged as the big winners.

The Muslim Brotherhood, formed in 1928, banned by Mubarak and his predecessors and now known as the Freedom and Justice party, has emerged as the strongest political party in the land, having won 47 per cent of seats in the first democratically elected parliament in decades. And in a sign of the times, the new speaker of parliament, Saad el Kantani, is a member of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Al Nour, a more orthodox Islamic party whose platform calls for the strict application of sharia law in the public domain and the segregation of sexes, ended up in second place, with 25 per cent of seats.

This means that nearly three-quarters of Egypt's new parliamentarians are Islamists, who were regarded as outcasts under the old regime.

The remaining seats were captured by the New Wafd, a nationalist liberal party that champions multi-party democracy and whose roots predate the fall of the monarchy in 1952; the Egyptian Bloc, whose partners include liberal, social democratic and leftist parties; a coalition of socialist and communist parties, and the National Democratic party, the now-disgraced vehicle of Mubarak's corrupt political machine.

Tellingly enough, the tech-savvy, western-oriented, middle-class youth activists who played a vital role in igniting the Jan. 25 uprising by means of Facebook and Twitter won only a handful of seats.

Whatever its composition, Egypt's parliament remains subordinate to the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, which assumed power after Mubarak's downfall.

Led by Mubarak's former defence minister, Field Marshal Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, and composed of self-serving generals who supported and propped up Mubarak until he was deemed a liability, the council has promised to turn over its authority to civilians by the end of June, when a new constitution has been ratified and a president has been elected.

The council, whose members enjoy enormous economic privileges and prerogatives, is unlikely to submit to full civilian control after June, no matter who is nominally in charge.

Although it has partially lifted the despised emergency laws – which were enacted in the wake of the 1967 Six Day War and gave the regime sweeping powers to do as it pleases – they remain effectively in force.

The military's monopoly on power prompted one of Egypt's most respected figures, Mohamed El Baradei, to drop his bid for president. A Nobel Prize peace laureate who headed the International Atomic Energy Agency, he was one of the founders of the National Association for Change, which assumed an early role in calling for Mubarak's resignation.

Prior to announcing his decision not to contest the presidential election, he claimed that precious little had changed since last winter – "the former regime did not fall," he was fond of saying – and accused the military of cracking down on like-minded protesters.

According to human rights organizations, some 12,000 civilians have been tried before military tribunals since last February, charged with "thuggery," and more than 80 demonstrators have been killed.

Charging pro-democracy groups of hewing to a "foreign agenda," the military claims they have accepted foreign funds, attacked government buildings and fomented chaos.

Last spring, the interim government, chosen by the military, launched a formal investigation into the foreign financing of non-governmental agencies.

Two months ago, police officers raided the offices of these groups, some of which, like the National Democratic Institute, are funded by the United States.

These raids, having stoked tensions with Washington, may jeopardize U.S. aid to Egypt for the first time in three decades.

Nonetheless, the United States, in a historic foreign policy shift, has initiated contacts with the Muslim Brotherhood, which has always opposed U.S. interests in the Middle East, including its alliance with Israel.

(Israel's former ambassador to Egypt proposed a secret dialogue with the Muslim Brotherhood, but the idea died on the drawing board).

Recently, the chair of the U.S. Senate's foreign relations committee, John Kerry, and the U.S. ambassador in Cairo, Anne Patterson, met the leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood.

"The United States needs to deal with the new reality," said Kerry, comparing the Obama administration's outreach to the Islamists with Ronald Reagan's arms negotiations with the now-defunct Soviet Union in the 1980s.

By all accounts, the Muslim Brotherhood has assured U.S. diplomats that its objective is to build a moderate Turkish-style Islamic democracy in which human rights, free market principles and Egypt's international commitments and treaties are respected.

Muslim Brotherhood politicians, such as Mohamed Beltagy, claim that its Islamic agenda is broadly focused on creating social and economic justice, this in a nation where corrupt practices are common, crony capitalism is the norm and poverty engulfs the majority of the population.

All rhetoric aside, there is no doubt that the Muslim Brotherhood, and particularly Al Nour, want to reshape Egyptian society in their own deeply conservative image.

Mohamed El Baradei

But while both espouse traditional religious values, their constituents could not be more different. While the Muslim Brotherhood generally appeals to middle-class voters, Al Nour caters to working class and rural Egyptians.

Despite the parties' differences, secular Egyptians live in fear that the Muslim Brotherhood and Al Nour might well form a coalition to push through retrogressive domestic policies.

For a number of reasons, this imagined union may never materialize. The level of mistrust between the Muslim Brotherhood and Al Nour is considerable. The Muslim Brotherhood has called for a broad-based government representing all Egyptians. Al Nour has engaged the New Wafd and the Egyptian Bloc in talks to counter the domineering influence of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Understandably, Israel is concerned by the rise of Islamists in Egypt's unfinished revolution.

Rashad Bayoumi, the deputy leader of the Muslim Brotherhood, has described Israel as a "criminal enemy" and has said that his party will never recognize the Jewish state. Yet it would be surprising if an Egyptian Islamist government disavowed the 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

What realistically can be expected is an even colder peace between Israel and Egypt than has been the case until now.

Former BQ MP is a Jew by choice

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Richard Marceau, an 11th-generation Quebecker from a staunch Roman Catholic family and a former Bloc Québécois parliamentarian, is a Jew by choice.

He converted to Judaism in 2004 after a long process, but his spiritual odyssey began after he met a Toronto Jewish woman who opened "the door to a people, a nation, a culture and a religion that I grew to love."

Marceau's discovery of a faith and a community that are now an integral component of his identity is set out in his memoirs, A Quebec Jew: From Bloc Québécois MP to Jewish Activist (Editions du Marais). Originally published in French, the English-language edition is scheduled to be launched in Toronto on Feb. 16 at the Spoke Club, 600 King St. W., from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m.

A lawyer who currently works for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs as a senior adviser, Marceau wrote A Quebec Jew to dispel "misconceptions" French-Canadians hold about Jews.

"Ninety eight per cent of the Quebec Jewish community lives on the island of Montreal," he explained. "Consequently, not many French Quebeckers have interacted with Jewish people and therefore hold many misconceptions about us Jews. I saw the need for a book on Jews, Judaism and Israel written by a Quebecker, for Quebeckers, using Quebec cultural references."

Marceau used his own personal story to draw a portrait of Jewish history, culture and Israel and to tear down stereotypes about Jews.

He decided to write A Quebec Jew after attending sessions of the Bouchard-Taylor commission, which was convened to study the fraught issue of "reasonable accommodation" in the province.

"The majority of interveners were moderate, but some made it clear that to be a Quebecker, one needed to be a pure laine. I decided to tell my story to show that one can be a proud Quebecker and part of this fantastic, francophone, unique and distinct society while being a deeply committed Jew."

A Quebec Jew has been well received. "So far, so good," he noted, saying that major French-language newspapers in Quebec have covered it. "Now I'm working on a tour of Quebec to reach out to, and talk with, people who don't have many opportunities to interact with Jews."

Richard Marceau, right, presents his book, A Quebec Jew, to Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Born in Charlesbourg, Que., on Aug. 25, 1970, Marceau is deeply rooted in Quebec, his French ancestors having arrived in the colony of New France in 1635. His father, after whom he is named, is a former civil servant and a practising Catholic. His late mother, Michelle, was a homemaker.

Educated by priests in Quebec City, Marceau graduated from law schools at Laval University and the University of Western Ontario. He also studied at the Ecole Nationale d'Administration in France.

In 1997, at the age of 26, he was elected to the House of Commons. A sovereignist, he represented the Bloc Québécois in the riding of Charlesbourg. Re-elected in Charlesbourg-Jacques-Cartier in 2000 and 2004, he lost his seat in the 2006 federal election. For the next five years, Marceau worked for a pro-Israel lobby group, the Canada-Israel Committee.

An agnostic, he met his future wife, Lori Beckerman, a secular Jew and a fellow law student, while participating in an exchange program at the University of Western Ontario. Although they seemed to have little in common, they fell in love.

He had no intention of converting to Judaism when he was married, but eventually changed his mind. "I wanted to be part of this ancient religion that has given birth to Christianity and Islam, this philosophy that has attracted me by its emphasis on the family, helping one another and asking questions and reasoning."

Marceau converted in a Reform ceremony, but after becoming much more observant and traditional, he went through an Orthodox conversion.

"My conversion was simply a coming home of sorts," he said. "Many years before, a Jewish man I deeply respect told me I had a Jewish soul."

He acknowledged that his father did not react well to his conversion.

"It was hard, and is still hard, for him. Put yourself in his shoes. How would you feel if one day your Jewish son told you he was converting to Christianity."

To Marceau's four siblings, his conversion was not really an issue, since they are fairly indifferent to religion.

"As for my former constituents, I received one letter of disapproval."

Nonetheless, as he writes in A Quebec Jew, "becoming a Jew … meant becoming a member of a community that an important segment of Quebec society viewed with suspicion and undoubtedly ignorance."

The Quebeckers to whom he refers do not know Jews, he observed. "They don't know our exceptional contribution to Quebec. And they don't know Israel."

Antisemitism exists in Quebec, he said, but Quebec is not an antisemitic society.

Marceau, his wife and two teenaged sons, Michel and Olivier, live in Quebec, across the Ottawa River from the nation's capital. "Lori and I wanted our children – who are fluently bilingual – to grow up in a French environment."

A regular visitor to Israel, and a fluent Hebrew speaker, Marceau describes himself as "a pro-Palestinian Zionist."

He explained: "I do not believe that being pro-Israel means I cannot be pro-Palestinian. They are not mutually exclusive. I will not fall into the trap of seeing the situation there as a zero-sum game. I believe in the right of the Jewish people to have a state in their ancestral homeland, and I support the Palestinians' legitimate national aspirations."

Although he considers Israel as "a beacon of freedom, gender equality and democratic principles," he is troubled by the current "ugly debate" in the Jewish state over the place of women and opposes the Orthodox monopoly over religious functions.

A separatist who remains dissatisfied with Quebec's place in Canada, he says he would most likely vote yes should there be another referendum.

He claims the Bloc Québécois has always had a "fairly balanced" policy toward Israel, despite strong internal and external pressures to be much more critical of Israel.

"We have Gilles Duceppe to thank for that balanced position," he noted in a reference to its former leader. "I expect his successor, Daniel Paille, with whom I have been to Israel, to maintain a similar position."

Some sober analysis of an attack on Iran

Last week's column examined Tony Burman's claim in the Toronto Star that an Israeli attack on Iran this year is all but certain. This week's column looks at Israeli analyst Ronen Bergman's Jan. 29 New York Times Magazine piece, "Will Israel Attack Iran?"

At 7,600 words, Bergman's is a major article. Yet, surprisingly for someone who concludes that he believes Israel will attack, he offers almost no compelling evidence to support this view.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Bergman acknowledges early in his piece that "[Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu and [Defence Minister Ehud] Barak have both repeatedly stressed that a decision [to launch a pre-emptive attack on a country that has repeatedly threatened to destroy Israel] has not been made and that a deadline for making one has not been set."

He discusses at length the debate taking place in Israel, pitting former Mossad head Meir Dagan and former IDF chief Gabi Ashkenazi (among others who oppose a military strike) against the prime minister, defence minister and strategic affairs minister who, Bergman claims, favour such a strike as a final option.

Indeed, most of Bergman's article is an exploration of this debate, along with an account of what measures Israel has already taken. These include, allegedly, covert Mossad operations to set back Iran's nuclear weapons program, such as industrial and computer sabotage, and assassinations of Iranian nuclear scientists. These are in addition to overt measures, namely the advocacy of biting international economic sanctions on Tehran.

There is no sense in Bergman's sober examination that Israel is rushing recklessly or foolhardily into a war with Iran, let alone, as Burman suggested in his Star piece, that Israel is trying to ensnare both Iran and the Obama administration in such a war in 2012.

Bergman repeatedly raises the question of whether an Israeli assault even stands a good chance of being successful, where "success" means not destroying Iran's capacity to produce nuclear bombs but only being able to set that back by a few years. He cites experts who claim that, given all the time Iran has had to widely disperse its assets and bury them deeply under mountains, an Israeli assault might be able to set the program back by only several months. If so, some have asked, is it worth taking the risk and starting a war with potentially devastating consequences?

Even if the best that can be achieved is a three-year delay in Iran's program, is a pre-emptive strike worth the risk? "[The Iranians] are holding the fissile material at sites across the country, most notably at the Fordo facility, near the holy city Qom, in a bunker that Israeli intelligence estimates is 220 feet deep, beyond the reach of even the most advanced bunker-busting bombs possessed by the United States." If the United States, with strategic bombers that Israel lacks, doesn't possess the capabilities required to destroy such a vital target, what can Israel, which relies on the United States for bunker-busting bombs, do?

Well-known analyst Barry Rubin has been looking at this debate with cool detachment. He recently wrote in the Jerusalem Post that the fact some Israeli leaders talk openly about the possibility of attacking Iran "is the biggest proof that they aren't about to do it." Israel has always acted on the basis of surprise, not by declaring publicly and repeatedly its military plans.

On the other hand, several analysts have argued that only the United States has the military might for the sustained bombing operations required to inflict sufficient damage to Iran's nuclear facilities. Matthew Kroenig makes such a case in "Time To Attack Iran," in the January-February issue of Foreign Affairs. Yet even Kroenig acknowledges the claims of critics that success is far from assured, and that since Iran might be able to reconstitute its program, the United States might only be delaying "the inevitable."

Kroenig's bottom line, however, is that the only thing worse than a pre-emptive assault on Iran's nuclear assets is living with a nuclear-armed Iran.

Concert to feature 'world's greatest cantors'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Last July, Cantor Eric Moses of Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue was sitting with colleagues Sol Zim and Yaakov Motzen over a late-night shwarma dinner in Manchester, England, where they were attending a cantors' convention.

It was approaching midnight when the conversation turned to the idea of mounting a major cantorial concert.

Moses suggested having it in Toronto. "Let's go big," he remembers saying.

Now, after months of organizing "The World's Greatest Cantors in Concert: The Present and the Future," he's still enthused about the project.

The event will take place Wed., March 28 at 7:30 p.m., at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Moses will serve as MC, and the event will be a fundraiser for Beth Sholom. Tickets start at $60.

"The idea of cantors performing together en masse doesn't happen frequently," Moses told The CJN. "This is a great opportunity to see all the great cantors assembled in one location."

Two of the 11 cantors in the concert are based in Israel, while the rest work in North America.

Cantor Eric Moses

He said that he has had calls from people in Chicago, New York and Los Angeles who want to attend. For him, it's a "Grateful Dead moment," like having fans of the rock band converge from afar.

Moses said that the "golden age" of chazzanut dates back to the early 1900s, when immigrants came to North America from eastern Europe. "The power of music speaks volumes to people."

Because going to Broadway shows or the opera was not affordable for many immigrants, people went to synagogue "to get their week's entertainment," he said.

Moses noted that cantorial music transcends religious denominations. A case in point: he trained at the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute, which is an Orthodox institution, but serves a Conservative congregation.

"There was always a common understanding, regardless of affiliation," he said. "The love of the art form breaks down the barriers."

Performers at the concert include "up-and-coming talent" Yanky Lemmer and Yaakov Stark, who are both based in New York, and Netanel Hershtik, from Westhampton Beach, as well as seasoned chazzanim Chaim Adler (Israel), Moshe Shulhof (Miami), Benzion Miller (Boro Park), Alberto Mizrahi (Chicago), Sol Zim (New York), Gideon Zelermyer (Montreal), Naftali Herstik (Israel) and Yaakov Motzen (Miami).

Adler, Miller and Motzen have all served Toronto congregations. Adler was at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, while Miller served Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, and Motzen was at Shaarei Shomayim.

Young adults get set to gather in Vegas

Tribefest connects through Jewish culture

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In just its second year, TribeFest, "a celebration" of Jewish culture for young North American Jews, is on pace to attract a capacity crowd of 1,800 people to its three-day event in Las Vegas next month.

TribeFest co-chair, Toronto native Jason Rubinoff, 41, said he's excited to be part of an initiative meant to give Jews avenues to make meaningful connections.

A Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) project, TribeFest drew more than 1,300 people from 84 communities to its inaugural event last year.

The programming caters to Jews between the ages of 22 and 45 who are encouraged to connect with their roots by learning about Jewish culture, social justice, networking and socializing during the three-day event at the Venetian Hotel in Las Vegas March 25 to 27.

Building on its momentum from last year, Rubinoff said he is encouraged by the commitment from Canadians who have already registered.

About 70 Canadians attended last year, but this year they're on pace to double that number.

"Last year, Ottawa sent nobody. The Canadians came from Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg," Rubinoff said.

He said registration just opened last month, and at least 10 Jews from Ottawa have already signed up.

"It's a matter of spreading the word. And if you can get those connectors, friends bring friends."

Rubinoff emphasized that TribeFest is not a conference.

"It's really a celebration. The whole idea is to really connect people. It's not about a conference that's all about federation," Rubinoff said.

"Typically, conferences are about campaigning, giving back, getting involved, giving money… TribeFest is really about finding people and opening up the tent and letting everybody come in. The goal is for them to discover something Jewish about them, and hopefully along the way… they're going to be able to connect with something that they didn't connect to before."

Participants will be treated to presentations from entertainers, authors and athletes including former Saturday Night Live cast member and comedian Rachel Dratch, New York Times best-selling The Year of Living Biblically author A.J. Jacobs and four-time Olympic gold medalist, swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg.

Rachel Dratch

In addition to the main stage speakers, the scheduled programming includes content on six different themes, or tracks: faith and spirituality, Israel and the Middle East, culture and the arts, social justice and global responsibility, innovation, and hot topics.

Rubinoff said JFNA solicited proposals for programs, and he was floored by the interest as more than 150 program proposals were submitted by local federations and individuals.

In addition to lectures and programs, TribeFest will also present a "Big Show."

"It's an exhibit hall where organizations set up tables, and it's a good opportunity for people to walk through and discover Jewish organizations and establish meaningful dialogue with organizations."

TribeFest has even incorporated a social service project in partnership with PJ Library, a non-profit organization that mails free Jewish-themed children's books to families in 165 North American communities.

Rubinoff said TribeFest organizers will send busloads of participants to various public Las Vegas schools in underprivileged areas on March 26, to distribute 1,000 backpacks filled with books.

"We've actually worked with the school board to identify what they need, that the books are age appropriate and specifically for the curriculum.

We should all protect kids

Rabbi Erin Polonsky

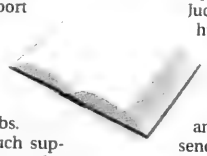
The Ontario government has introduced legislation to deal with the escalating problem of bullying in schools. The legislation is an effort to keep our children safe, promote healthy interactions between children and ultimately ensure productive communities in which we can all thrive. I applaud Premier Dalton McGuinty for promoting such legislation.

The bill is a realistic one, recognizing that bullying is all-encompassing. Children may bully each other for trivial reasons or for more deep-seated reasons. Regardless of the impetus, bullying has no place in our schools and has been shown to have dire and even deadly consequences.

Judaism teaches that we must take every measure possible to save another human life. Preventing bullying is such a measure. Maimonides teaches in his Code that if one person is able to save another and does not save him, he transgresses the commandment in Leviticus that "neither shalt thou stand idly by the blood of thy neighbour." Similarly, if one person sees another drowning in the sea, or being attacked and although able to rescue him does not, or if one hears others plotting evil and does not call it to the person's attention, or if one knows that a violent person is going to attack another and although able to make him change his mind, he does not – if one acts in any similar way – he transgresses the injunction of "neither shalt thou stand idly by the blood of thy neighbour."

Some of my Orthodox colleagues – although thankfully not all – have taken issue with the bill's provision that schools must support "gay-straight alliance" clubs. They have argued that such support is contrary to Jewish law and values. Together with my colleagues of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto, I take issue with this contention.

Rabbinic Reflections



Judaism promotes acceptance of others and openness to differences, and it values healthy children, adults and communities. The creation of these clubs is the ultimate gesture of acceptance of differences. It is an opportunity for gay youth to have a safe place to express themselves among peers, as well as for straight youth to reach out to their gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered counterparts in an effort to understand, accept and learn from one another. That is the essence of what it means to be part of a community. This is not an attack on religious values. This is what religious values are all about! There are strong differences of opinion within the Jewish community about homosexuality, but wherever we stand, we should all be able to rally around measures that seek to keep our kids safe.

Judaism teaches that each human being is created b'tselem Elokim, in God's image. To deny gay people their safe places in our schools and communities is to send the message that they do not contain the spark of God within them. Sending this message will not bring them closer to Judaism. On the contrary. It will create resentment for our beautiful tradition. Nowhere does the bill support indoctrination to reject their parents' faith, as has been alleged by some Jewish groups. If any indoctrination is happening here, it is of tolerance and acceptance, a lesson that we can all use.

Rabbi Erin Polonsky is spiritual leader of Neshamah Congregation of York Region in Vaughan, Ont.

Exciting new discoveries

Recently, two important discoveries pertaining to Jews and ancient Israel were announced. One involved a cache of Jewish documents around 1,000 years old that were found in a cave in Afghanistan. The other discovery takes us much further back in time to the first use of the word "Israel" outside of the Bible. It dates to almost 3,500 years ago in ancient Egypt. Both of these discoveries are amazing in their own ways.

The discovery of Jewish documents in Afghanistan takes us far from our ancient homeland to a war-torn region that is constantly in today's headlines. Controversy and strife are not new to Afghanistan. That country has been experiencing these things for millennia.

What is intriguing is the question of what Jewish documents were doing in the area some 1,000 years ago. At the time, Afghanistan was near the route of the fabled Silk Road that connected China to Europe, which had been craving its luxury goods, especially silk, at least as far back as the days of the Roman Empire.

We know that Jewish merchants and traders were involved in the region dating to ancient times, at least as far back as the days of the Persian Empire. The fabled documents from the Cairo Genizah, from roughly the same time period as the ones found in Afghanistan, also mention Jewish merchants dealing with the East.

More than a century ago, the legendary British-Hungarian (and Jewish) explorer/archeologist Sir Aurel Stein explored the Silk Road and found a number of sites containing manuscripts in its vicinity. Since the Silk Road traverses mostly desert, any writings that were left there tend to be very well preserved. Stein found the world's oldest book as well as documents that were more than 2,000 years old. But he didn't find any Jewish writings. The documents recently found in Afghanistan are promising to add fascinating new evidence about Jewish activities on the Silk Road in the Middle Ages.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

Also exciting is the recent publication of a discovery by scholars in the Egyptian Museum of Berlin about the earliest use of the term "Israel" outside of the Bible. Until this publication, the earliest extra-biblical mention of Israel was on a monumental inscription of the Pharaoh Merneptah, son of Ramses II (a.k.a. Yul Brynner), dated to late 13th-century BCE.

This new inscription pushes the use of "Israel" back by two centuries to around the year 1,400 BCE. If this dating is correct, it raises a host of fascinating questions. Among them would be the date of the Exodus. One also wonders what characterized this early Israel and, most importantly, is there any information about its religious beliefs and practices.

The fascination of any discovery is the fact that it raises more questions than it answers. As Einstein once said, "When the light of knowledge expands, so does the darkness surrounding it."

Project recalls 1939 tragedy of MS St. Louis

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The tragic fate of a ship carrying Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany was recalled Jan. 25 at the launch of the MS St. Louis Commemorative Project, which features a new children's book and a mural depicting the ill-fated ship and its passengers.

The project, funded by a $100,000 grant from the federal Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration, was spearheaded by Devora Caytak of the Jewish Youth Library of Ottawa and overseen by project manager Erica Phillips-Posner.

The MS St. Louis was a German ocean liner that set sail from Hamburg on May 13, 1939, with 937 refugees from Nazi Germany – 930 Jews and seven non-Jews – on board, hoping to find a safe haven.

Only 29 passengers were able to disembark in Havana, Cuba. The rest were then refused entry to the United States and Canada.

The ship was forced to return to Europe, where several countries did accept some of them. Unfortunately, even many of those who found refuge were later murdered in Nazi concentration camps.

One passenger, a young child at the time, was Herbert Karliner. He lost his family in the camps, but survived and made a life for himself in Miami, Fla. He was at the launch to tell his story, which drew both tears and smiles from the audience.

The author and illustrator of the book, So Near, and Yet so Far: Klara's Voyage on the M.S. St. Louis, were present to describe the background and process of developing the project. Author Sara Loewanthal gave a dramatic reading of the book as its strikingly illustrated pages were projected on a large screen behind her. She was followed by illustrator Nicholas Jackson who described his research and showed the various stages of development of the sketches to paintings that formed the book's illustrations.

The other component of the project is a large, multimedia mural by artist Michoel Muchnik, who described the symbolism of the various objects and depictions. The mural was on display in the foyer of Ben Franklin Place, the venue of the event, but it will be permanently installed at the Jewish Youth Library.

Speaking on behalf of the federal government, Rick Dykstra, parliamentary secretary to Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, said that "federal officials made a tragic and misguided decision" to deny the MS St. Louis the right to land in Canada, and he vowed that "the outcome of that decision should not and will not be forgotten."

Ottawa city councillor Katherine Hobbs echoed the sentiment on behalf of Mayor Jim Watson and the municipal government, noting that "much has changed since 1939… it is my hope that all Ottawa residents take the time to learn about this important event in history."

Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv and U.S. Ambassador David Jacobson also attended the event. Earlier in the day, a video conference was held at the U.S. Embassy to introduce the project to various U.S. consulates.

One thousand copies of the book will be distributed to schools and libraries across Canada, along with an educational booklet for teachers on topics such as bullying, immigration and responsibility.

Give your children an equal share.

Israel goes to the Oscars – Pt. 1

When they walk down Oscar's red carpet and into the Kodak Theatre, they won't turn as many heads as Meryl or Michelle or George or Brad. But one country will be hanging on to every move of the filmmakers behind Footnote, this year's Israeli nominee at the Academy Awards for best foreign-language film and the 10th Israeli film to be nominated in this category. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael1]

Today, a look back as Israel goes to the Oscars.

Sallah Shabbati (Israel's Oscar nominee in 1964): Back in pre-Tevye days, Chaim Topol played Sallah in Ephraim Kishon's satire of Israeli society. Not a model citizen, here's how Jewlicious.com describes him. He's "lazy, he's a drunk, he's a gambler who brings his sheshbesh [backgammon] board to the synagogue… he on principle refuses to talk to women, and he's perfectly willing to sell off his eldest daughter to the highest bidder. And yet, he may be the most lovable character in Israeli cinematic history." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael2]

Hashoter Azulai (The Policeman) (1971): Kishon was also behind Israel's next nomination, as writer and director of Hashoter Azulai. Here's how one reviewer described policeman Avraham Azulai, as played by Shaike Ofir. "Azoulai's incompetence is not a result of lack of skill, but rather that of a soft heart and kindness. When he stops a driver for some kind of traffic violation, he writes him up, but it's not the driver who ends up paying the fine but Azulai himself." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael4] Enjoy a scene from the movie in which Azulai manages to quell a haredi demonstration in his own inimitable manner (no subtitles). [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael14]

Ani Ohev Otach Rosa (I Love You Rosa) (1972): Set in Jerusalem in the 1880s, director Moshe Mizrahi's Ani Ohev Otach Rosa tells the story of a young Sephardi widow who according to the halachah of the levirate marriage (yibum) is required to marry her late husband's brother, Nissim. But there's no immediate wedding – Nissim is only 11. Years later, Nissim returns with marriage in mind. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael7] New York Times: "Mr. Mizrahi's polished handling of his cast and subject makes them come alive in a simple, subdued and knowledgeable portrait." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael8]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

HaBayit Berechov Chelouche (The House on Chelouche Street) (1973): Director Moshe Mizrahi was back the following year with the story of a family of Egyptian Jews who settle in Tel Aviv in British-mandate Palestine of 1947. Gila Almagor plays the widowed mother of four, including Sami, whom we follow from shy teenager to member of the Haganah during the War of Independence. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael9] More on the movie here. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael10]

Mivtsa Yonatan (Operation Thunderbolt) (1977): Within a couple of years of the daring rescue at Entebbe, several dramatized versions appeared including Mivtsa Yonatan, featuring Gila Almagor with Yehoram Gaon as Yonatan Netanyahu. Despite the Oscar nomination, critics weren't as kind, calling the screenplay cliché-ridden and lacking nuance. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael11] Judge for yourself from the opening credits in which we watch the Israeli military training for the raid. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael13]

Next time, we return to the screening room for Israel's five most recent nominees for best foreign-language film.

Group decries 'veiled threats' against Jews

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A lecture at McMaster University by pro-Iranian, anti-Israel speaker Zafar Bangash late last month contained "veiled threats" against Jews, said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

"Despite McMaster's assertion that the presentation by Bangash would be respectful, his words were clearly hateful, inflammatory and laced with veiled threats against Jews," Benlolo said.

During the Jan. 26 lecture, titled "Iran in the Crosshairs," Bangash, president of the Islamic Society of York Region, who is known for advocating Iranian-style theocracy, warned the crowd of the consequences of going to war with a heavily armed Iran.

A video of the lecture was uploaded by a website called shiatv.net and in it, Bangash is recorded saying, "If there were an attack on Iran, and obviously the fact that Israel would be involved in it, [the] U.S. would be involved in it, it is quite possible that, you know, members of the Jewish community might be targeted... We will not want that to happen at all, but you cannot control the emotions of the people."

He continued with a non sequitur, saying, "You know what happens to the Palestinian people – someone throws a stone and the Israelis come and bomb the whole town. This is common knowledge."

During a question-and-answer period, Bangash compared Zionists to Nazis and racists, and he reiterated his stance that Jews are not entitled to their own homeland.

Days before the lecture – sponsored by the Hamilton Coalition to Stop the War, Independent Jewish Voices, as well as student groups Students for Justice in the Middle East, McMaster Muslims for Peace and Justice, and Students Resisting War and Occupation – Benlolo wrote a letter to McMaster president Patrick Deane.

The letter challenged the president to take a stand against the speech by Bangash, who was quoted during a rally last summer at Queen's Park as saying, "This black man in the White House, Barack Obama... he would rather have Americans starve to death, but he cannot say no to the Zionist parasitical state... That is what makes them racists, that is what makes them barbarians."

McMaster spokesperson Gord Arbeau responded by putting the onus on event organizers to ensure respectful dialogue and cited the university's "important role in maintaining freedom of speech."

Benlolo said he planned to file a complaint against Bangash with Hamilton police.

'We were celebrating our culture'

"We weren't doing anything political. None of our material had a political slant. But this group of students took it upon themselves to make it political."

Gurza added that there was nothing controversial about the IOC message.

"Literally, we were celebrating our culture, so it was very upsetting."

One of the protesters, Sumbal Sabah, said the demonstration was planned in solidarity with Palestinians.

"Israel can continue to enjoy its freedoms – cultural, educational, economical freedoms – at the expense of millions of Palestinians who continue to suffer," Sabah told The CJN in an e-mail.

"The students who took part did so out of respect for Palestinians, not hatred for Israel."

Gurza said she complained to Mark Wellington, the USC's senior manager of student life, that the protesters were violating her club's right to hold an event and therefore violating school policy.

According to Western's building usage policy, "counter-programming and protesting are not allowed on the same day as the programmed event..." and "no individual or group shall... distribute posters, banners, flyers, handbills or any other printed material without prior written approval of the USC."

Protest at Western

Gurza said Wellington called campus police to monitor the protest and ensure it didn't cross the line into a physical confrontation.

"I was speaking with the campus police, and they said that because it was peaceful they didn't do anything, but what I want to stress is that the members of SPHR violated the policy. You're not allowed to counter-protest, especially without approval," Gurza said.

"My biggest concern is that they violated these policies, and the USC has to make sure that these policies are enforced."

But Chapnick explained that the SPHR members may have found a loophole that could let them off the hook.

"No particular group took ownership of the protest, so technically, [USC] can't sanction the group, because they didn't take responsibility for it," he said.

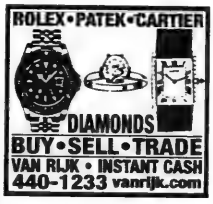
USC president Andrew Forgione said the council "is currently investigating whether or not any USC clubs had direct involvement in the protest."

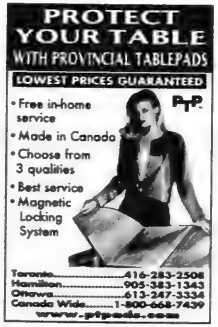
He added that if it can be proven that SPHR used club resources to support the protest, his office will file a complaint to the USC's clubs governance committee (CGC) for review.

"CGC can authorize the sanctioning of a USC club – sanctions that can range from prohibitions to probation to de-ratification," Forgione said.

London Jewish Campus Services executive director Naomi Mazer condemned SPHR for its "clear violation of university space policy.

"The administration must ensure that their policies regarding space are enforced and that SPHR face disciplinary action for their despicable behaviour, which was an embarrassment for the entire student body."

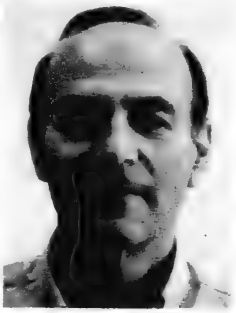




Shoah studies program seeks master's students

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The hope for the University of Haifa's new Holocaust studies graduate program – the first of its kind in Israel – is that it will address the declining number of young students who choose to pursue an academic career in the field.



Arieh Kochavi

Michael Meyer, fundraising director for the Canadian Friends of Haifa University, said he hopes the program will breathe new life into the aging community of Holocaust studies scholars.

"A lot of people in Shoah studies are getting older, and not many younger people are getting involved in the courses, and they're concerned about that," Meyer said.

Although Holocaust studies courses are available at universities all over Israel, this is the first program in Israel that offers a master's degree.

Prominent World War II scholar Arieh Kochavi, who heads the year-long master's program, as well as the Strochlitz Institute for Holocaust Studies at the university, said in a statement that the multidisciplinary program is designed to train a new generation of Holocaust scholars to explore newly uncovered documents and archives in Israel, Germany and Poland.

Museums such as the Ghetto Fighters' House museum and Yad Vashem in Israel, and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., will collaborate with the program's administrators to provide students access to archives.

The multidisciplinary aspect of the program enables students from backgrounds in history, international law, and social psychology to explore the Holocaust through different lenses, Meyer said.

The program also includes two study trips to Germany and Poland in partnership with local institutes, including the Center for Research on Anti-Semitism at the Technical University of Berlin (ZFA), the Polish Academy, and the Center for Holocaust Research at the Jagiellonian University of Krakow, Poland.

In addition to visiting sites that are relevant to Jewish life before and during the war, students will also have the opportunity to attend seminars with leading German and Polish scholars.

Meyer said he's hoping to attract some Canadians students to the program, which runs in English.

"We're trying to get this course out to as many people as possible, even those who can't afford it. For those who can't afford it, we're looking to raise scholarship money," he said.

"For people who live outside of Israel, it costs about $18,000, and that includes tuition, room and board."

He said Israeli students can be sponsored for $12,000.

Applications are currently being accepted for the program, which begins in October. For more information, contact Meyer at mmeyer@haifa-univ.ca, or call 416-917-6648.

Tribefest set for March

These are books that the parents of these children would not be able to afford," Rubinoff said.

"It's a very powerful way of demonstrating the act of giving back and giving to a community."

Elyse Lackie, incoming chair of JFNA's National Young Leadership Cabinet, a network of socially conscious Jews in their 20s, 30s and early 40s, said she attended TribeFest last year, and will be there again in March.

She said it's exciting to watch people getting engaged and excited about Jewish culture.

"It is so invigorating to see so many different faces of a young Jewish community. And this is not what your parents or grandparents would have looked like 50 years ago. It's a totally new look," Lackie said.

"There are tons of different opportunities – both Jewish and non-Jewish – to connect to something. Jews are looking to connect in meaningful ways and that's not exclusive to Jewish connections."

As for the role of the federations, Lackie described them as conveners that bring people together for a good cause.

"If you have an experience that invigorates you in a Jewish way, we're going to make it possible for you to continue on that Jewish journey. That's our role – not to do it for you, but to open the door for you and show you to experience it for yourself."

My road to recovery (Part 2)

I repeatedly asked my physiotherapist to treat my leg, but he refused, telling me my back was causing issues in my leg, not the other way around.

I continued to get worse. Then my MRI results came in. It showed re-herniation of the L5 disc, right side. I had to see a surgeon. I told my doctor that I wasn't having another back surgery. He tried to comfort me by explaining how good surgeons are today and how they don't have to open me up like last time. I didn't care. I wasn't having more back surgery!

He referred me to chiropractor Dr. Rebecca Henry. "If she can fix me, she can fix you," he said. My doctor is the smartest man I know, so I left his office, fired my physiotherapist and went to Dr. Henry's office to book an appointment.

From the very first session,

Fitness Corner

things began to change. When I tell people that, they don't believe me, but it's true! After the initial assessment, she went to work on my right hamstring (the back of my leg) with her hands. Over the next several months, three times a week, she used different muscle-release techniques on both the front and back of my leg.

Later, we moved on to the Graston Technique, another way to help stimulate muscle healing, and lately to a laser for deep-tissue healing in areas I still won't let her treat by hand. I remember asking her later on what made her treat my leg when everyone else assumed all my symptoms were back- and disc-related.

She said, "Because you said so, so what would it hurt?" Dr. Henry also gave me homework from the very first session: those dreadful transverse activation (deep core) exercises. Again I had a flashback. I was given those exercises right after both my back surgeries to help with recovery. I do those exercises every day without fail. I am determined to spend the rest of my life getting better.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Thousands mourn death of toddler

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — "Baruch Dayan Ha'emet." (Blessed be the true Judge).

Those words, recited when we receive news of a tragedy, ran over and over again last week on Facebook's Ayelet Yakira Galena's fan page, as hundreds wept and expressed their condolences over the Jan. 31 death of two-year-old Ayelet Galena.

Ayelet died at 5 a.m. in Cincinnati Children's Hospital, five months after receiving a bone marrow transplant on Aug. 30, 2011, for a rare and deadly condition that causes bone marrow failure.

"With unstoppable tears and broken hearts, we regret to announce… after hours of fighting and holding on, our precious Ayelet, the light and strength for so many, could not fight anymore," her parents Seth Galena and Hindy Poupko Galena said in a statement on a blog site devoted to their young daughter's fate, Eye on Ayelet (ayeletgalena.tumblr.com).

The sad ending culminated weeks of up-and-down crisis for the toddler, whose fate had been followed by thousands.

In December, Hindy Poupko Galena, the daughter of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron's Rabbi Reuben Poupko and his ex-wife, Arna Poupko Fisher, told The CJN that despite the fact that Ayelet's transplanted marrow was a "seven-out-of-eight" match after a search of many months, she still faced numerous, potentially life-threatening hurdles.

The situation remained "precarious," Poupko Galena said at the time. (Poupko Fisher also lives in Cincinnati and was a constant presence at her granddaughter's bedside.)

And it was indeed precarious. Over the five months, little Ayelet faced several life-threatening situations that raised euphoric hopes for family and supporters when she rallied one day, and despair the next when another crisis arose.

On her last day, Ayelet "put up a serious fight, but her lungs collapsed, her blood pressure dropped, and the blood could not get to her huge heart," her parents said.

Ayelet Yakira Galena

In an entry on The Sisterhood, a blog at Forward.com, the story of Ayelet's transplant and decline was chronicled, with photos of her dressed in "frilly frocks" that later gave way to the reality, "myriad tubes and machines connected to Ayelet's swollen body and bald head (which was always lovingly covered with floral hats and headbands)."

The Forward blog also notes how her parents would celebrate Shabbat at their daughter's bedside and recite "the post-bathroom Asher Yatzar, so that Ayelet's kidneys might again begin working ('We need a big night of peeing and prayer,' they wrote on Jan. 30)," the day before her death.

Before the transplant, Ayelet's search for a marrow donor had captured the imagination of New York media and celebrities, among them Rihanna, Eva Mendes and 50 Cent, all of whom had recorded supportive messages on her behalf.

On Ayelet's Facebook fan page last week, however, word of her death spread rapidly to her more than 5,000 followers.

"I am sitting here in Israel, tears streaming down my face for someone I never personally met," said one message.

"Am Yisroel is in mourning," said another.

About a week before Ayelet's death, her parents said the gestures of support they received from the public "are the single reason we are [still] standing."

"People are only dealt the cards they can handle," Hindy Poupko Galena had told The CJN three months after the transplant.

Funeral services for Ayelet took place Feb. 1 at the Jewish Centre in New York's Upper West Side, where her parents live.

Mission focuses on social justice

MONTREAL — "How did this come to happen?" "This," was the highly publicized December incident in Beit Shemesh, Israel, in which an eight-year-old Orthodox girl was spat upon by extremist haredim for not dressing "modestly" enough. The sole Canadian participant in a recent Yeshiva University social justice mission to Israel says the above question, posed by a panellist on the mission, served as an ideal backdrop to frame a serious, thoughtful discussion on the issue. Here, Montrealer Gershon Albert, at right, speaks with two participants during Yeshiva University's Tzedek v'Tzedaka mission to Israel. To read story, go to cjnews.com

Survivor of 9-11 no longer lives to work

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA —Esti Fogel was once ill and housebound, relying on the goodness of family and friends to help her with basic needs such as meals and child care. Once recovered, she resolved to "pay it forward" and help others whenever possible.

Three and a half years ago, Fogel assembled some friends and formed Ten Yad (Lend a Hand), a group of volunteers whose mission is simply to help those in need.

In its relatively brief existence, Ten Yad has grown by leaps and bounds. Now a registered charity with an army of volunteers, the organization remains unaffiliated and independent but works co-operatively with other community agencies to meet common goals. When individuals or families are facing acute, life-altering situations such as illness or death – or the happy occasion of the birth of a child – volunteers will step in and provide food, transportation, child care or whatever is needed.

On Jan. 29, Ten Yad held its inaugural Friend-Raising Gala at the Canadian Aviation Museum. The gala showcased the organization and introduced it to many members of the community who may not have heard about it. Another fund-raising effort, the Ten Yad cookbook was also launched.

In the midst of a large hall filled with airplanes, 350 people were seated at elegantly decorated tables enjoying the klezmer and Yiddish-inspired tunes played by the Central Band of the Canadian Forces Jazz Quintet.

The keynote speaker, New Yorker Ari Schonbrun, told his remarkable tale of "lending a hand" as a survivor of the 9-11 collapse of the Twin Towers in New York. A senior executive at Cantor Fitzgerald, Schonbrun, he said that of the firm's 662 employees, "only one person walked out without a scratch, and you are looking at that person... 658 of my friends and co-workers were brutally murdered, simply because they were sitting at their desks, no other reason." Three others were badly injured.

Schonbrun described the series of "co-incidences" on that fateful day that led to his miraculously surviving the explosion and how he helped a co-worker who was badly burned to escape from the building and get to a hospital for treatment.

"I was plucked out of a burning building... and somebody asked me why. I need to talk to people and tell people that we live in a world today that is going in the wrong direction and we aren't doing anything about it. We need to make a change," he said.

His personal priorities have drastically changed in the past 10 years. He no longer lives to work, he said, but takes time to enjoy his family and to appreciate life.

"The next time somebody calls you and asks you to help," said Schonbrun, "just answer, Ten Yad."

The problem with Zero Tolerance in domestic abuse cases

Family Matters
by John Syrtash

for 31 years

Ontario has a zero tolerance policy and police officers are instructed that they must lay a charge "if there are reasonable grounds to believe an offence has been committed in relation to the Criminal Code, Child and Family Services Act, Children's Law Reform Act or Family Law Act". In the politically-charged atmosphere of "domestic violence", 'reasonable grounds' often consists of a complaint about a single event of domestic violence, even if there is no visible evidence, no corroborating witness and even if the event took place years ago.

Once interviewed, the person alleged to have committed the offence may protest that nothing happened whatsoever, that the whole allegation is fabricated, or that it was a minor mutual struggle (i.e. they pushed each other with the person alleging the assault starting the altercation). It makes no difference. In many such situations, once the person goes to the police, the police often videotape the complaint made and arrest the person complained about. In almost every one these situations, the complainant is a woman and the person complained about is a man. Men rarely go to the police to complain about women attacking them.

In those cases where women have truly been assaulted, this process appears to be quite fair and works well to protect women and their children who witness violence in their families. Much has been written in this space over the past 31 years about domestic violence against women and how difficult it is to obtain their co-operation when I attempt to interview them; many are so abused that they cannot break out of such relationships.

They are psychologically trapped by the men who victimize them into a pattern of abuse to which they have become "accustomed", especially if they are financially tied to the gentleman's purse strings. No matter how much I explain that the law will protect them with spousal/child support, property division and restraining orders, most don't believe me or find greater comfort in the abusive relationships with these monsters to which habit has chained them. When I offer to get them medical or psychological help, many simply walk way, comforted in the "knowledge" that their partners have taken away all their self-esteem in exchange for a Faustian devil's bargain: a roof over their heads, an allowance and a way of life that they "know."

Women not the only victims of domestic violence

What is less known is the hidden problem of domestic violence against men. I have had several male clients over the years who have been punched, had items thrown at them, have been stabbed with pens and other implements, have been bruised, spat on, kicked violently and even hospitalized. These men are terrified to fight back. Some are badly intimidated by their partners, don't have the personality to "fight back", or are very concerned about the impact of their reactions on their children. Others seriously worry about the police and getting arrested should they defend themselves, so they walk away and don't tell anyone, especially the authorities. They are also understandably embarrassed. It may not be 'politically correct' to even suggest this problem exists, but it sadly does, and often in wealthy homes, not just modest ones.

When a person, inevitably male, is falsely accused, it is not unusual for them to be summarily arrested, falsely imprisoned, kicked out of their own home, sometimes where their businesses are located, strip-searched and thrown in jail. This includes some of my clients. They are then alienated from their own children and cut off from their possessions inside the home, often for several months to a year, until their criminal lawyer is brave enough to conduct a full-blown trial to obtain a complete acquittal. Such a trial can easily cost $10,000-20,000 and that money is never recovered, unless they have successfully sued their wives for wrongful prosecution.

In many such cases, such a victimized spouse might settle for a "peace bond" in which he agrees to "keep the peace" even if he didn't do anything because it's cheaper and less risky than a trial! And just how fair is that? Unfortunately, by that time, his wife has effectively won the custody battle, since she has had the children in her care for the better part of the year and "exclusive possession" of the house. In fact, she falsely accused her husband of assault and had him arrested for the express purpose of creating "facts on the ground" in order to get sole possession of the house and control of the children. Once your husband is arrested the court imposes a Court Order, called a recognizance or "bail order" pending trial (a year later) that prevents the husband from coming back to the house.

The victimized spouse, usually male, has now spent thousands of dollars for the privilege of (a) being thrown in jail; (b) being shut out of his own home; (c) suffering the embarrassment of being charged with a criminal offence in front of the community; and (d) not seeing his kids except on terms his wife will accept, unless the Family Court intervenes, which costs even more money — a lot more money.

Moreover, it takes time to have a Family Court make an Order on parenting issues. In Newmarket Ontario, one can wait several months for a Case Conference and then a motion on the issue. And since the fellow is no longer living with the children, the Court will normally side with the parent who has lived with the children since the separation when awarding "custody" or "primary care and control." Hence, by kicking out the father on false charges, the mother wins this fight by underhanded means. Then when the father goes to Family Court, he fights only for "better terms of access." Is this really fair?

Surely more careful investigations must be carried out before the Zero Tolerance rule is applied so summarily in this Province.

In the meantime, men better make sure that they marry or partner with a woman who plays fair. Otherwise, a jail cell may be awaiting them if she decides to simply pick up the phone and dial three digits: 911.

Men living with their "better halves" in potentially violent situations would be wise to consult competent family law counsel to ask about their options to avoid such confrontations. Moving out may be the best solution in certain situations. In others it would be the worst decision and getting a civil restraining order might be the wisest course of action if you feel threatened.

Chabad centre eyes increased security

Antisemitic incidents in Victoria

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — In the wake of recent antisemitic incidents in Victoria, B.C., one Jewish institution in the city is hoping to beef up its security measures.

The Jewish Education Centre, run by Chabad Vancouver Island, is applying for a $5,000 grant from Public Safety Canada's Communities At Risk Securities Infrastructure Program, which provides up to 50 per cent of total project costs to a maximum of $100,000 per project.

Ottawa requires applicants to have at least 50 per cent of project costs funded by non-governmental sources when an application is submitted.

The centre wants to install $10,000 worth of security upgrades, so it must raise $5,000 on its own, said Elizabeth Wolfe, who is writing the grant application on behalf of the centre.

Rabbi Meir Kaplan, who operates the centre near McKenzie Avenue and Borden Street, hopes to improve the centre's exterior lighting, add a lock to the Aron Hakodesh and insert a Shabbat timer to enhance security on Friday nights and Saturdays.

The centre serves an average of 100 people each week, providing a preschool program for 15 children Monday through Friday, as well as Sunday school for 30 children, religious services on weekends and adult classes on weeknights.

"The centre is on the edge of a schoolyard and in somewhat of an undesirable neighbourhood," Wolfe said.

"At night it's very dark here, and people will pass through the school to access that neighbourhood. We had an antisemitic incident in the park nearby a while ago, and we're hoping that by improving the lighting, it will discourage people from doing that kind of thing in the future."

Rabbi Kaplan was quick to add that he rarely encounters any antisemitism in Victoria, and that the recent graffiti in the city's Jewish cemetery was not reflective of the community at large.

"We're fortunate to live here," he said. "But nevertheless, there've been incidents that make us feel it necessary to have better security around the facility so we can offer people going into the building maximum protection. We feel it's our responsibility."

New rabbinical book called 'heretical'

JTA

A prominent Chabad Lubavitch rabbi in Toronto has condemned the latest book by celebrity Rabbi Shmuley Boteach and pronounced that it's "forbidden" for anyone to buy or read it.

In an open letter published on the Jewish news website the Algemeiner, Rabbi Immanuel Schochet denounced Rabbi Boteach's book, Kosher Jesus, as "heretical."

The book "poses a tremendous risk to the Jewish community," wrote Rabbi Schochet, an emeritus professor of philosophy and religion at Humber College and spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Joseph.

"I have never read a book, let alone one authored by a purported frum Jew, that does more to enhance the evangelical missionary message and agenda than the aforementioned book," Rabbi Shochet said. "It is forbidden for anyone to buy or read this book, or give its author a platform in any way, shape or form to discuss this topic."

The volume "must be rejected for being heretical." The latest offering from Rabbi Boteach, a Chabad-ordained rabbi and former movement emissary who was criticized by fellow rabbis years ago for offering spiritual advice to the late singer Michael Jackson and for authoring the 1999 book Kosher Sex, explores the Jewish roots of Jesus and whether the exploration should lead modern Jews to "rediscover" and celebrate the extent to which the Hebrew Bible shaped his thinking.

In a lengthy response disseminated widely online, Rabbi Boteach said that he must "defend myself against the appalling and libelous charge of heresy." He said his book paints Jesus as "a Torah-observant Jew whose mission it was to restore Jewish observance fully among his Jewish brethren and fight Roman persecution."

"It's time these universal Jewish ideas that have so influenced the world be traced back to their original source," Rabbi Boteach wrote in defence of his book. "It's time that the Jewishness of Jesus be re-discovered by Christians."

As for Rabbi Schochet's charge the book will embolden Christians to convert Jews, Rabbi Boteach said that the book "is the ultimate argument against Christian missionaries" because it offers "significant information to argue convincingly against any Christian attempt to evangelize Jews."

Canada looks to strengthen trade with Israel

Viva Sarah Press

JERUSALEM — Canada's Finance Minister Jim Flaherty met with members of Israel's financial community and representatives from Israel's high-tech sector during his visit to Israel last week.

He made no secret of Canada's desire to expand its free-trade relationship with Israel.

"I admire what has been done with the Israeli economy. We have much to learn on research and development and boosting innovation and productivity. I look forward to learning more," Flaherty said at a Jerusalem reception marking the Israel-Canada friendship.

Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz said that the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) has been beneficial for both countries. Now, both governments want to expand the trade agreement's scope.

CIFTA went into effect in 1997, initially eliminating tariffs on all industrial products manufactured in Canada and Israel, as well as a limited number of agricultural and fisheries products. By 2003, additional agricultural and agri-food tariff reductions on goods previously excluded from the agreement were successfully negotiated, according to Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

"We want to expand the free-trade agreement with Canada. It's good for us to export and import but, more importantly, an Israel-Canada relationship can build co-operation in high-tech, biotech, between universities, research and development and innovation commercialization. Relationships are already good, but there's room for improvement," Steinitz told The CJN.

"Canada and Israel are two of the few countries that succeeded to grow again following the economic crisis. Both governments need to enhance and promote and widen [CIFTA] to other areas, and I'm confident this can continue to our economic co-operation in the future," Steinitz said.

Jim Flaherty and Benjamin Netanyahu

Israel is Canada's sixth-largest export market in the region. The Canadian government reports that Canada-Israel bilateral goods trade has more than doubled since the inception of CIFTA, from $507 million in 1996 to $1.4 billion in 2010.

"Co-operation in science and technology, research and development, sophisticated agriculture, military co-operation, this co-operation is going to be enhanced," said Minister for Strategic Affairs Moshe Ya'alon. "We share not just the same interests, but we share the same values."

In Canada, the government's consultations are ongoing on how best to modify CIFTA.

Flaherty conducted a conference call with Canadian media from Tel Aviv last week.

In his preamble to the gathered media on the call, Flaherty noted that while in Israel he'd met with, among others, Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz; Palestinian Monetary Authority governor Jihad Al Wazi, and Stanley Fischer, governor of the Central Bank of Israel.

"Their perspectives were helpful in understanding the economic landscape here," Flaherty said. He said he also visited the Weizmann Institute and the Technion Institute of Technology, calling the visits "informative."

Asked by The CJN how he plans to increase trade and grow the Canadian economy via relations with Israel, Flaherty said he met with Israeli Chief Scientist Avi Hasson "and had a good discussion" about venture-capital initiatives, innovation and research and development programs.

Flaherty also reiterated Steinitz's position that broadening CIFTA is a priority.

"We are advocating expansion of free trade with Israel. That would be desirable," he said.

The biggest lesson he learned from his trip to Israel, he said, is that Israel's focus on the research and development sector was a result of "an intentional effort to become a world leader in commercialization.

"Canada has a challenge… we're one of the world leaders in investing in R&D, but we're not getting the productivity results we should be seeing from that investment. So I learned a great deal about how R&D and innovation are approached here, not only by government but also by the universities, research institutes and by businesspeople who invest."

He said Canada should consider emulating some "aspects" of the work Israelis do in these areas.

Baird, Flaherty celebrate Canada-Israel friendship

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — It was an evening of mutual gratitude.

At a gala reception held on Feb. 1, visiting Canadian parliamentarians spoke of Canada's passionate bond with this little nation in the Middle East, while their Israeli hosts reiterated appreciation for Canada's strong support.

"There are so many great connections between Canada and Israel," Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs John Baird told those gathered at the dinner at the Inbal Hotel.

The event was hosted by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the Canadian Embassy and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation.

Baird and Canada's Finance Minister Jim Flaherty spent last week in Israel holding meetings with their Israeli counterparts and reaffirming Canadian support for the Jewish state.

The Canadian ministers held brief meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres. They also travelled to the West Bank for talks with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and his prime minister, Salam Fayyad.

Canada's decision to stand by Israel when much of the world is only too happy to condemn Jerusalem is something Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said should not be taken for granted.

"Certainly in this day and age when there are dark forces turning, it's important that countries that share the same values share a good relationship. We have appreciation for the Canadian government," Ayalon told The CJN.

With harp and flute notes in the background, dozens of parliamentarians from both countries mingled with embassy staff, reporters, army officials, philanthropists and businessmen.

Guests-of-honour Baird and Flaherty, who attended numerous policy roundtables during their visit to Israel – including speaking at the Herzliyah Conference and meeting with Israeli heads of industry – were cheery and full of praise for the Israel-Canada alliance.

"The saying, 'If I'm not for myself who will be for me'… I think that for many years Israel felt there was no one in its court," Flaherty said. "But as Minister Baird said, it's not that Canada is behind Israel, it's that Canada stands shoulder to shoulder with Israel." Such sentiments were reiterated throughout the evening.

Canadian and Israeli diplomats and Jewish community representatives met in Israel last week. From left are, Israeli Ambassador to Canada Miriam Ziv, CIJA Chair David Koschitzky, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon, John Baird, Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz, MK Benny Begin, Israeli Minister of National Infrastructure and Canada's Ambassador to Israel Paul Hunt. [Mati Millstein photo]

"Canada was always Israel's friend but in the last 10 years became one of Israel's best friends in the world – some people will say Israel's best friend. I think the Canadian government is better friends with Israel than we are sometimes with ourselves," said Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz.

Though an overall feeling of optimism prevailed at the event, there was no missing the perforations of threats from the Arab world and specifically Iran.

"We're living through a period in which support for Israel is important. There's a critical mass of threat… a triangular threat from Sinai, from Gaza and from Egypt," Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler told The CJN.

Baird said it was during a visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Center that the danger Israel faces from Iran really hit home.

"[Nazi leader] Adolf Hitler wrote about his plans in great detail. He had already published Mein Kampf. What [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad has said about what the Jews are and wanting to wipe them off the earth is something the world should take very seriously," Baird told The CJN. "I'm not saying this is what is going to happen. But when people look back 50 or 60 years, no one can say we didn't know. No one can be surprised. The Holocaust tells us that we must take Iran's threats seriously."

Baird announced from Israel last week that Canada had tightened sanctions on Iran and had frozen the assets of three Iranian-born Canadians and five Iranian companies operating in Canada, and prohibited them from conducting business using the Special Economic Measures Act.

Israel's Minister of Information and Diaspora Yuli Edelstein also spoke of the Iranian threat.

"Iran is a great danger. Ahmadinejad is saying that he will increase by 127 per cent the nuclear budget. He's on a mission and is determined to fulfil it. The question is whether the world is on a mission and determined," Edelstein told The CJN.

"Whether coming from Iran, Al Qaeda or Hamas… we need some more clear voices like [Canada's] when it comes to challenges ahead of us," Minister for Strategic Affairs Moshe Ya'alon said. "The Canadian people and the Canadian government are so admired here in our tiny country, the State of Israel."

Nevertheless, the positive vibe at the party managed to overcome the mention of warnings and threats emanating from Israel's enemies. After all, this was a reception to celebrate friendship.

"We're honoured and pleased by the ministers' visit and the support of the Canadian government of Israel as a fellow democracy," CIJA chair David Koschitzky said.

Canadian Ambassador to Israel Paul Hunt, a co-host of the affair, and Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada attended, along with many of their embassy staff.

Baird acknowledged the high turnout of Israeli ministers to the event, saying that he knows only too well that most parliamentarians prefer to duck out of engagements of this nature. Even David Weinberg, director of the Israel Office of CIJA, who has hosted many events, told The CJN that not only was it easy to secure the attendance of Israeli guests but also other influential people requested they be invited to the affair.

Baird and Flaherty were scheduled to travel to China from Israel over the weekend.

U.S. and Israel to work together on Iran: Obama

JTA

WASHINGTON — Israel and the United States will work "in lockstep" to keep Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, President Barack Obama said.

In a pre-Super Bowl interview on NBC Sunday, Obama also discounted reports that Israel is getting ready to strike Iran.

"I don't think that Israel has made a decision on what they need to do," he said.

Asked if Israel would give him advance warning of a strike, Obama said he would not go into details of conversations, but added, "We have closer military and intelligence consultation between our two countries than we've ever had…

"My number 1 priority continues to be the security of the United States, but also the security of Israel, and we are going to make sure that we work in lockstep as we proceed to try to solve this, hopefully diplomatically."

U.S. President Barack Obama

Obama downplayed reports of an Iranian attack on U.S. soil, and said a military confrontation would be destabilizing.

"Obviously, any kind of additional military activity inside the Gulf is disruptive and has a big effect on us – it can have a big effect on oil prices," he said. "We've still got troops in Afghanistan, which borders Iran. And so our preferred solution here is diplomatic, we're going to keep pushing on that front."

He repeated, however that "we're not going to take any option off the table."

In related developments, Jewish and Israeli institutions in the United States are on high alert over concerns that Iran or its proxy will target them, a U.S. news network reported.

The institutions have established special precautions, ABC reported Feb. 3, citing an Israeli internal security document. The document was a letter from the head of security for the Israeli consul general for the Mid-Atlantic states, according to ABC, which said the security threat has increased on "guarded sites" such as Israeli embassies and consulates, and "soft sites" such as synagogues, as well as Jewish schools, restaurants and community centres.

ABC reported that local and regional law enforcement and intelligence officials in U.S. and Canadian cities including New York, Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Toronto have increased security at Israeli and Jewish institutions, and that federal officials have also increased vigilance in looking for imminent attacks.

"In the past few weeks, there has been an escalation in threats against Israeli and Jewish targets around the world," ABC quoted a U.S. regional intelligence document as saying.

The document said that "law enforcement should be vigilant when making periodic checks at all Jewish facilities."

In addition, an Israeli intelligence report warned that forged Israeli passports might be used by potential terrorists trying to leave the Middle East and enter the United States and Canada.

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said Feb. 3 that his country is prepared to assist those who would confront Israel and the United States.

Egypt's gas pipeline to Israel attacked again

JTA

JERUSALEM — Egypt's gas pipeline to Israel was attacked for the 12th time in a year on Sunday.

The attack near El Arish in the northern Sinai Peninsula came after masked gunmen planted explosives under the pipeline, security officials told the French news agency Agence France-Presse. The pipeline also supplies gas to Jordan.

Gas delivery was stopped after the attack. The supply of gas to Israel has been stopped numerous times in the last year, leading to a scramble to find alternate fuel sources to produce electricity, all of which are more expensive.

Egypt supplies Israel with more than 40 per cent of its natural gas needs to produce electricity, and electricity prices have risen by more than 10 per cent in Israel since the attacks began.

The first attack on the pipeline came in February 2011 during uprisings against Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who has been deposed.

Selling gas to Israel has been unpopular on the Egyptian street since the opening of the pipeline in 2008. Mubarak has been accused of giving Israel a sweetheart deal on the gas, since Egypt lost more than $714 million on the pact.

Jordan agreed in October to pay double what it previously paid for gas from Egypt, Reuters reported. Egypt is expected to demand that Israel also agree to a major price hike.

Also Sunday, Israel's Delek Group Ltd. said it has discovered what it estimates to be nearly 1.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in Israeli waters near the Lebanese border. Delek is working in co-operation with the U.S. company Noble Energy.

Syrian army targets houses and their residents

The report says Assad's goal was to gain ground ahead of a visit by Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov, who was scheduled to arrive in the country Tuesday, along with a military delegation that includes the head of Russian intelligence.

Assad's aim, sources say, is to display his control of the situation and his ability to suppress the unrest, with the determining battles to be staged in Homs and in the re-occupation of the town of Zabadani, which fell to Free Syrian Army forces last month.

An Al-Arabiya report indicated that the battle over Zabadani has already begun, with Syrian soldiers defecting to the opposition along with eight tanks, and that Homs has been placed under a siege that included cutting electricity and water supplies.

The report also claimed that the Syrian army for the first time has been using rockets to target houses in Zabadani, as well as mortars to hit populated areas. As of this writing, some 60 people have been reported killed and hundreds wounded in the wanton attacks. Seven houses have been reported demolished with their residents still inside.

Syrian opposition organizations that are active internationally are currently trying to gain a political foothold by bypassing the UN Security Council, where a resolution underwritten by the Arab League failed after Russia and China vetoed it on Saturday.

Bashar Assad

Opposition leaders are now trying to find a way forward, as it is clear that Turkey and the Arab states oppose military action against the Assad regime, and the imposition of economic sanctions will not stop Assad.

In view of the Russian and Chinese opposition and the Iranian threat to open a new front, there is doubt as to whether a western coalition would agree to act directly against Syria. The question is whether the Free Syrian Army will be able to get additional military assistance, and to arm itself with heavy artillery, tanks and shells so that it will be able to pose a real challenge to the Syrian army and change the civilian resistance into a real military struggle, much as the rebel forces in Libya did.

Germany donates $13 million to Yad Vashem

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Visiting German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle signed an agreement last Wednesday granting 10 million euros ($13 million Cdn) to Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Center over the next 10 years.

"The agreement signifies the German government's wish to help facilitate Yad Vashem's various activities in Israel and globally which further commemoration, documentation and education of the events of the Holocaust," Yad Vashem said in a statement.

Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar said that the agreement constituted an important source of funding, and will be used to expand Yad Vashem's activities and to locate and purchase significant Holocaust documents from archives in Europe, making them accessible to the public via the Internet, Israeli media reported.

"This decision reflects the importance that the German government attaches to the subject of the Holocaust. The commemoration of the Holocaust is an endless task," Sa'ar said.

Yad Vashem chairman Avner Shalev said, "This agreement strengthens the obligation of the German government and the German people regarding Holocaust remembrance."

German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle

Westerwelle, who met Holocaust survivors at the centre in Jerusalem, spoke of "a program against forgetting."

Among the survivors who met Westerwelle was 80-year-old Vera Dotan, who survived Auschwitz and the death march the Nazis forced the prisoners to make as the advancing Red Army closed in on the extermination camp in early 1945.

Her father was murdered immediately on arrival in Auschwitz, and her only brother died of typhus two days before the camp was liberated.

For 40 years, she hardly spoke a word of German. That changed in the 1980s, when she heard that some people did not take the Holocaust seriously.

"I then told myself, together with my husband: 'We must tell our story. People must know the Holocaust is not a fairy tale.'"

From then on, she has told her story again and again, and in German, too.

She said that she was "very grateful" for the funding agreement. "We need a lot, and when it comes from Germany, it is maybe worth even more," she said.

Israel Briefs

Ethiopians arrive

Seventy-one Ethiopians arrived in Israel accompanied by lay leaders from the Jewish Federations of North America. After landing Feb. 2 at Ben-Gurion Airport, the new immigrants were taken to an absorption centre in Kiryat Gat. The mission travelled to Ethiopia to meet the remaining members of the community and to visit the Jewish community centre and school in Gondar before escorting the olim to Israel. The federation umbrella group gives more than $3 million annually to Ethiopian aliyah and absorption in Israel, as well as medical and educational services for those still in Ethiopia. More than 6,000 Ethiopian Jews, who are called Falash Mora, are in Ethiopia seeking to make aliyah.

Cooking for peace

Chefs from the White House, the Kremlin, the Élysée Palace and the Chancellery of Germany are touring Israel and will cook a gala dinner for peace. The delegation from the group Club des Chefs des Chefs, or Chefs of the Heads of State, arrived in Israel Feb. 1 at the invitation of Shalom Kadosh, executive chef of the Fattal Hotel Group. The elite chefs will travel around the country, meet local chefs and cook a gala dinner called "Cooking for Peace" at the Herods Hotel in Tel Aviv. Each chef will prepare a dish that is representative of his or her local cuisine with Israeli and Palestinian chefs. Proceeds from the dinner will be donated to the Peres Center for Peace in Tel Aviv to support its youth programs.

200,000 missiles aimed at Israel, IDF officer says

Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — About 200,000 missiles are aimed at Israel at any given time, a top Israel Defence Forces officer said last Thursday, adding that Iran's ability to obtain nuclear weapons is solely dependent on the will of Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The remarks by military intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Aviv Kochavi came after IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz, said last Wednesday that the threats facing Israel have increased and intensified in recent years due to regional instability.

Speaking at the Herzliya Conference, Gantz said that Iran's nuclear program is a "global problem and a regional problem," adding that Tehran's attempts to acquire nuclear weapons must continue to be disrupted.

Kochavi, speaking at the Herzliya Conference, spoke of the growing threats Israel was facing: "a more hostile, more Islamic, more sensitive Middle East, one more attune to public sentiment, less controlled by the regimes, and less susceptible to international influence."

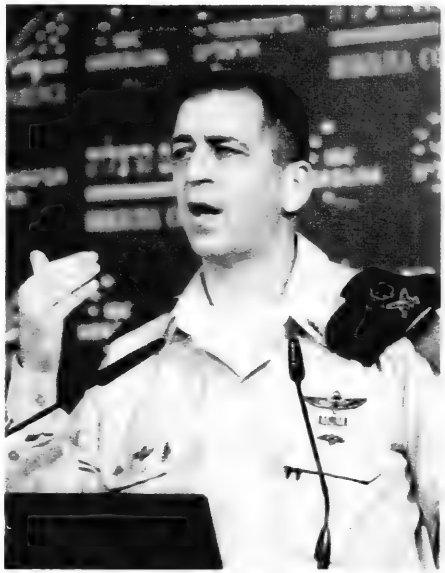
The chief of military intelligence said that about 200,000 missiles are aimed at Israel at any given time, but he added that "Israel's military deterrence is intact."

Referring to Israel's concerns over Iran's nuclear ambitions, Kochavi presented a relatively tame estimation of a possible timeline en route to an Iranian atomic bomb, saying that the project depended more on the will of Iran's supreme leader than on any technological advancement.

"If Khamenei issues a command to achieve a first nuclear explosive device, we estimate it would take another year before that's achieved," the top IDF official said, adding that "if he asks to translate that ability to obtain a nuclear warhead, that would take another year or two."

Kochavi also reiterated the IDF estimate that Iran is in possession of more than four tons of low-grade enriched uranium as well as almost 100 kilograms of uranium enriched at 20 per cent.

"If those are enriched more, to a 90 per cent level, that would be enough for four atomic bombs," the IDF officer said.



Military intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Aviv Kochavi

The military intelligence chief added that the sanctions on Iran "are taking their toll. There's 16 per cent unemployment, 24 per cent annual inflation, and practically no growth," he said, adding that "at this point the pressure isn't leading Iran to a strategic shift."

However, Kochavi said "there's a potential, with greater pressure, that the regime, interested first and foremost in its own survival, would reconsider its position."

Defence Minister Ehud Barak said on Thursday that if sanctions on Iran's nuclear program do not prove effective, then military action against the Islamic Republic must be considered.

"Today, unlike in the past, there is widespread international belief that it is vital to prevent Iran from becoming nuclear and that no option should be taken off the table," Barak said at the closing day of the conference.

"Should sanctions fail to stop Iran's nuclear program, there will be a need to consider taking action," he said.

He noted that many analysts believe that confronting a nuclear Iran will be much more complicated and dangerous, and will cost many more lives than taking action today. "Whoever says 'later' could find that it is too late," he stressed.

Barak added that Israel's challenge is to continue aiding the international community to work toward halting Iran's nuclear program, "without taking any option off the table."

Deputy Prime Minister Moshe Ya'alon said that all of Iran's nuclear facilities are vulnerable to a military strike, adding that the spectre of a nuclear Iran would be a "nightmare to the free world."

Ya'alon also said that an explosion that virtually destroyed an Iranian Revolutionary Guard missile base near Tehran late last year targeted a system that was "preparing to produce a missile with a range of 10,000 kilometres, thus threatening the United States."

Speaking at the conference, President Shimon Peres said that Tehran's "evil" leaders cannot be allowed to obtain nuclear weapons.

"It is the duty of the international community to prevent evil and nuclear [weapons] from coming together. That is the obligation of most of the leaders of the free world, one which they must meet," Peres said.

Study finds Israel second-most educated country

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is the second-most educated country in the world, says a report released by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

According to the OECD's Education at a Glance 2011 report, 78 per cent of the money invested in education in Israel is taken directly from public funds, while 45% of Israel's population has a university or college diploma.

Israel also had the largest increase in overall population, approximately 19.02 per cent from 2000 to 2009.

The report shows that while education has improved across the board, it has not improved evenly, with some countries enjoying much greater rates of educational attainment than others.

According to 24/7 Wall St., which helped compile the data, the countries included in the list have had educated populations for a long time. While they have steadily increased the percentages of their populations with post-secondary educations, the increases are modest compared to developing countries.

According to the report, the 10 most-educated countries in the world are Canada, Israel, Japan, the United States, New Zealand, South Korea, Norway, the United Kingdom, Australia and Finland.

Israel experiencing natural gas shortage

Avi Bar-Eli and Itai Trilnick
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israel is running out of natural gas as the only existing production field, the Mary-B field off the Ashkelon coast, is close to being depleted.

This could lead to electricity shortages, planned blackouts and much higher electricity rates. The shortage is expected to last at least until next year, when the Tamar gas field starts production.

Noble Energy, which operates the Mary-B field for the Tethys Sea partnership, has halted production at eight of the 10 wells in the field over the past few weeks. The remaining gas in the other two wells will run out within a few weeks at the present rate of production.

The Energy and Water Resources Ministry, previously known as the National Infrastructure Ministry, is expected to order Noble Energy to cut back on its gas production within the next few days, for the fourth time so far this year. The idea is to draw out the supply of gas from the offshore field for as long as possible and allow increased production during the hot summer months when electricity demand reaches its peak.

This shortage comes on top of the problems with the supply of Egyptian natural gas, which provided 40 per cent of Israel's gas before continued attacks on the gas pipeline in Sinai suspended gas supplies for months. The current supply from Egypt, which could stop again at any time, is about 25 per cent of the amount the Egyptians are committed to providing.

The alternative to natural gas is powering electricity plants with diesel or heavy fuel oil, both of which are much more expensive and more polluting. That would also necessitate higher electricity rates. A 6.6 per cent electricity price hike is already scheduled, and an additional 13.4 per cent price hike is in the works over the next three years. Even worse, the infrastructure for supplying diesel fuel is inadequate to meet the quantities required to supply all the Israel Electric Corporation's (IEC) power plants and replace the natural gas. This could force blackouts.

Last week, the energy ministry asked the public to cut back on electricity use during the peak winter hours of 5 to 10 p.m., as electricity production could fall short of peak demand during these hours.

The supply of gas from the Mary-B field was cut from 550,000 cubic metres per hour to only 300,000. This amount is expected to drop within days to just 150,000 cubic metres per hour. This would allow flows of 350,000 cubic metres in July and an increase to 450,000 in August and September. After that, the amount would be cut back to a minimum until the field runs dry.

The government originally planned on adequate supplies from the Mary-B field through mid-2013, though these estimates were updated and supplies were expected to run out in early 2013. But a number of wells collapsed as they filled with water, which cut the supply much more quickly than forecast.

Last year the Energy and Water Ministry ordered the Tethys Sea partnership to develop various satellite fields near Mary-B. Tethys Sea is 47 per cent owned by Noble Energy, an American firm, and 53 per cent by the Delek Group. The nearby fields include the Noa field, to the east of Mary-B, with 1.2 billion cubic metres of natural gas. This field was discovered in 2000 but never developed as the company said it was not commercially viable. Only last year did the ministry order Tethys Sea to begin development, and the state hopes production can start in August.

Tethys Sea will also start emergency drilling, including further wells in various small structures within the Mary-B field in July, which could supply another 0.7 billion cubic feet of gas.

Switching to diesel fuel would raise the cost by four times. The IEC would also have to raise very large sums to fund the purchase of the more expensive fuels, above the planned five billion shekels ($1.3 billion Cdn) it had intended to raise this year.

The problem with the diesel fuel supply infrastructure is that it was intended to replace natural gas only for short periods of time and cannot meet the requirements of peak production. In addition, the frequent switch between diesel and gas in 2011 created excessive wear and tear on the generating equipment.

The energy ministry has other plans to reduce electricity use. It wants to encourage consumers to shift electricity use to off-peak hours by charging lower rates at such times and much higher prices at peak hours.

Cabinet considering Med-Red railway

Moti Bassok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet is examining a plan for building railway links between the Mediterranean and Red Sea coasts, which would carry passengers and create a new route for Europe-Asia trade that could compete with the Suez Canal.

Establishing passenger train service through the desert, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said, would mean the southern Red Sea resort of Eilat would be just two hours away from Tel Aviv, 350 kilometres to the northwest.

The cabinet is expected to vote on the plan at this week's meeting.

"There will be a line for carrying goods from Asia to Europe," Netanyahu told the weekly cabinet two weeks ago. "It has created very great interest among the emerging powers – China and India, and others," he added.

A network of new railway lines and roads would connect the new Eilat route to northern Israel, and this would create "a junction between continents," the prime minister said.

"[The plan] is therefore of strategic importance, both nationally and internationally," he added.

The Ministry of Transportation is considering several proposals for a new rail line, but the preferred option would have Chinese state-owned contracting companies do the work.

"The professional capability of the Chinese companies in the construction of railway systems and transport networks is among the best in the world," Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz is quoted as saying. Katz met his Chinese counterpart in Beijing last September, and the two agreed to prepare a joint proposal for the Eilat route.

Israeli Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz [Flash90 photos]

Israeli officials say the so-called Med-Red railway could also be used for future exports of Israeli natural gas to India, and possibly China, from the Mediterranean fields currently under development.

However, Labor party leader Shelly Yachimovich slammed what she called Katz's plan "to put the railway to Eilat project into the hands of the Chinese while bypassing proper tender processes and importing thousands of Chinese workers." She said the move showed "a malfunction in the government's judgment...The government's first duty is toward its own citizens," she added.

Israeli quartet gives lesson in improvised jazz

Daniel Koren
Special to The CJN

Toronto's Trane Studio was packed recently when the Ori Dakari Quartet made their way onto the stage, to play the first show of a scheduled three-city Canadian tour, with stops in Edmonton and Calgary.

Jazz enthusiasts sat in anticipation, watching as the Israeli band commenced into graceful, unprecedented, improvised jazz. The result was a charming and tranquil evening of unscripted jazz.

Guitarist Ori Dakari made a name for himself in the so-called "radical Jewish culture" scene of New York, where he moved in 2007. His debut CD, Entrances, in 2009, was released on composer/producer John Zorn's Tzadik Records.

On Entrances, Dakari, playing the roles of lead guitarist and composer, was accompanied by three musicians he met in the United States – alto sax player Uri Gurvic, drummer Eric Doob and bassist Takashi Sugawa. Entrances made a strong impression on the international jazz community. With his fellow instrumentalists, Dakari went on to perform in Thailand, Serbia, Russia and Israel before making his way to Toronto for his Canadian debut.

At Trane Studio, the foursome wasted no time in displaying the range of their influences and styles, transitioning from contemporary jazz to Middle Eastern tambour, from relentless bass solo to a North African-inspired medley.

Each member displayed his own brand of musical prowess at least once throughout the evening, standing at the forefront of the group's unified musical direction. Two enjoyable moments of merit, respectively, were when Gurvich brought out the flute and when Doob fashioned upbeat, African-embraced rhythms with the bongos.

The sessions were intimate and intense, the musicians playing together in earnest, developing off one another's melodies. The Middle Eastern sets were high-spirited, with Dakari leading the way as the ensemble presented their interpretation of Israeli music, fused with jazz in its core. It was certainly an enlivening experience, though thoroughly as endearing were the softer, more subtle moments throughout the evening. Various solos transpired, with some instances of discernible North African medleys. Exotic would be one way to characterize the session, and during the finale, it could even be called experimental.

Jazz is a broad term. As such, scholars have had difficulty defining it, though they have agreed that it remains in a state of perpetual metamorphosis. Though the majority of their set remained within the confines of contemporary jazz, the Ori Dakari Quartet managed to give a little something extra to the traditional-jazz pundit. They offered fans the good fortune of sitting in a relaxed, casual venue lit by candles, while the music urged them to dance the horah. A rare occasion indeed.

Born and raised in Kfar Saba, Dakari was acclaimed as an "outstanding musician" by the Israeli army and the Israeli ministry of culture when he was only 18 years old.

The quartet was brought to Toronto by the Ashkenaz Foundation, which has brought an exceptionally diverse lineup of musicians to the city. It has promised more spirited shows to come in 2012. Mind you, this evening of fruitful, Israeli swayed jazz will be hard to top.

CELEBRITY BRIEFS

Ben Stiller to star in show about Jewish family

JTA

NEW YORK — Ben Stiller reportedly has signed on to work with the cable giant HBO to produce, direct and star in a new show called All Talk written by Jonathan Safran Foer.

The show revolves around a Jewish family living in Washington and is billed as "politically, religiously, culturally, intellectually and sexually irreverent." Alan Alda, of MASH fame is set to co-star.

Shooting is set to begin in the fall.

Fran Drescher's close encounter : Sorry all you Nanny fans but we have some bad news: Fran Drescher is losing it.

In an interview with The Huffington Post, Drescher confessed that she believes in aliens. Here's the story:

"You know, it's funny because Peter [Marc Jacobson, Drescher's ex-husband] and I both saw [aliens] before we knew each other, doing the same thing, driving on the road with our dads ... we were both in junior high. A few years later we met, and we realized that we had the same experience. I think that somehow we were programmed to meet. We both have this scar. It's the exact same scar on the exact same spot."

Jacobson disputes the account, saying the scar is from burning herself with hot water, not an alien invasion. But Drescher is undaunted.

"That's what the aliens programmed us to think," she explains. "But really, that's where the chip is."

Synagogue hits up Mel Gibson: What's up with Congregation Beth Shalom in Corona, Calif.? The strapped-for-cash synagogue reached out for financial help to the Hollywood actor best known to Jews for his antisemitic rants.

In a letter to Mel Gibson, the synagogue made this offer: "Our proposal to you, Mr. Gibson, is since you have been cited as an antisemitic, and have denied those allegations, what better way to prove to all your fans and the nay sayers - – than to endorse and help raise funds for our cause – SOS, Save Our Synagogue."

Gibson's rep said the actor "knows nothing about the request but wishes the temple all the best."

A GIANT BOOK

English literacy institute A.H.A.V.A. has launched its seventh annual read-a-thon by inviting local school children to help create what is expected to be the biggest book ever made in Israel. The book, titled The Giant's Book, is about a giant who can't find a book big enough to read. It measures almost two metres tall, over one metre wide and is being made by school children from over 13 schools in Ma'aleh Adumim who will be given words to write and design. A.H.A.V.A. is a non-profit organization in Israel dedicated to promoting English literacy for children.

EVENT AT KIEVER SYNAGOGUE EXPLORES 'LOST AND FOUND SPACES' IN TORONTO, MONTREAL, WARSAW AND KRAKOW

Globe and Mail architectural critic Lisa Rochon moderates a panel consisting of writer Shawn Micallef, author Sara Ferdman Tauben and architectural photographer David Kaufman on the subject of "lost and found" places in Montreal, Toronto, Warsaw and Krakow.

Ferdman Tauben's new book is Traces of the Past: Montreal's Early Synagogues, copies of which will be available for sale. The discussion will be followed by a reception with music and refreshments, during which guests may view a specially mounted exhibition of Kaufman's photographs of synagogues and city spaces.

Presented by Makom, the grassroots downtown community, at the Kiever Synagogue, 25 Bellevue Ave., which this year marks its 100th anniverary. Thursday, Feb. 15, 7 p.m. $5 at the door.

Theodore Bikel, seen here in Sholom Aleichem

The Kiever also hosts an open house at which guests may chat with Tauben and view Kaufman's photographs inside the beautiful historic sanctuary. Sunday, Feb. 19, 2 to 5 p.m.

Names in the News: Montreal-based filmmaker Sharon Hyman explores the concept of "feeling grown-up" in a new 52-minute documentary, Neverbloomers: The Search for GrownUphood.

Hyman, who specializes in "autodocumentaries" – turning the camera on one's self to tell one's own story – shows "a side of the female psyche not typically seen in the mainstream media," she says. Her previous autodocumentary, Worried, made with Naomi Levine, premièred at the Montreal New Film and Video Film Festival and was broadcast on WTN.

In the new film, Hyman speaks with friends, strangers, taxi drivers, doctors, a chassidic rabbi, a filmmaker and her mother. Her conclusion is that "we all feel like impostor grown-ups – at least part of the time." Premières on CBC's documentary channel, Feb. 27, 8 p.m. www.neverbloomers.com

Family business turned into an entertainment empire

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Soon after graduating with a master's of arts degree from Washington State University, Howard Pechet joined his family's hotel business, eventually turning it into an entertainment empire.

It started when Pechet's father, Eugene, who owned 19 Western Canadian-based hotels and adjoining taverns, asked his son to look into dinner theatres operating in the United States, in the hopes of starting one at the family's new Mayfield Hotel in their hometown of Edmonton.

Pechet opened Stage West in 1975. Admittedly, he didn't know what he was doing and says his first three productions did poorly.

The next production, The Gingerbread Lady, starring 1950s starlet Gloria DeHaven, was an ironic success.

"The Gingerbread Lady is about a retired alcoholic actress. Our main income in the theatre is from liquor, and I'm doing a play about this actress who comes out of rehab and falls off the wagon. So, it wasn't probably the best choice of plays to open with," Pechet says.

The next production, a Cole Porter revue, also failed. "I thought, we could probably do it ourselves and that's how we got started. [Then] I brought in [actor] Gig Young to do a play called Harvey and the thing just took off."

Since then, Pechet, now executive producer of Stage West and chairman of Stagewest Hospitality, which includes several hotels, dinner theatres and casinos, has produced almost 1,000 plays and has co-written 14 musical revues, setting the Guinness World Record for producing the most theatre productions.

His mission has been to offer a great buffet with outstanding theatre productions headlined by internationally known celebrities and entertainment icons from the world of television and movies, including Ginger Rogers, Mickey Rooney, Susan Ruttan, Anson Williams, Billy Hufsey, Loretta Swit and Don Knotts, to name a very few.

Howard Pechet with his Guiness Award

"Over the years, we opened theatres in Regina, Winnipeg, Calgary and Mississauga, and that's how we grew," says Pechet.

"We also produced plays in Palm Springs, San Diego and toured around Ontario."

He followed his theatre successes by opening hotels in Medicine Hat, Mississauga and a hotel/casino complex in Camrose, Alta.

Stage West in Winnipeg and Regina, although successful, eventually closed, which was more to do with property issues than anything else. The Edmonton location was sold. Stage West Calgary and Mississauga are thriving to this day.

Pechet started to pen his own shows in the late 1990s. His productions include California Dreaming, The British Invasion I & II and most recently, Motown Gold with director and co-writer Tim French, which received excellent reviews. There are plans to tour it in the United States.

"Right now, I'm working on a play called Summer in the City," says Pechet. "I'm doing this with Randy Johnson, a writer-director, who I have wanted to work with for some time. He did plays about Elvis and Janis Joplin, both sanctioned by their estates. Summer in the City will open in Calgary in May and in Mississauga next Christmas."

Pechet feels Jews have a historical bias that is culturally oriented. "Certainly, the Jewish community as a whole in Edmonton was very supportive of theatre, ballet and opera. Communities like in Winnipeg underpin many of the cultural activities that go on in Winnipeg," he says. "When you come out of a community that is so culturally supportive, I think it becomes an inherent characteristic of the children that grow up in those communities. It has helped me in my appreciation of music, the stage and actors."

Today, Pechet lives in Rancho Mirage, Calif., with his wife, Henriette. The two recently became grandparents to grandson, Greyson. A third generation of Pechets has now joined the family business. Pechet's son, Jason, is the president of Stagewest Hospitality and his other son, David, heads the casino division.

The Street Sweeper is a very inspiring read

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

There's a scene in The Street Sweeper (Doubleday Canada) where a black oncologist, a white Jewish historian and a skinny, black street sweeper carrying a menorah are engaged in conversation about a Holocaust survivor.

The story of how this unlikely group got together forms the basis of this bold and absorbing novel, the third by Australian writer Elliot Perlman, a former lawyer.

"We are far more connected to people than we realize," Perlman says over the phone from Melbourne. "We are connected in ways we would be astonished to find out and in ways we seldom realize. And we are connected to people around us through ways that we might not be aware of."

Elliot Perlman

The novel flips back and forth between several characters in different countries and different decades – including prewar Poland, the Warsaw Ghetto, Auschwitz, the displaced persons camps, postwar Chicago and present-day Manhattan.

It follows two main plot lines. One is of the unusual friendship between a black janitor, Lamont Williams, and a Holocaust survivor, Henryk Mandelbrot. The other follows Adam Zignelik, a Jewish-Australian historian in Manhattan, who is nervous about losing his teaching position at a university.

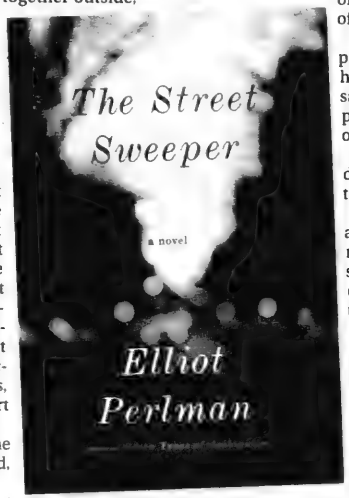
The Street Sweeper begins in present-day Manhattan, outside the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, where Lamont, an ex-con, is talking to Mandelbrot who is being treated for cancer.

The idea for this novel came when the author was living in Manhattan just across from this hospital.

"Manhattan, they say, is the microcosm of the world; well, this hospital is the microcosm of New York. It has every conceivable ethnic group, socioeconomic group and racial group. People from all over the world come to be treated, to work or to visit."

While waiting at a bus stop near the hospital, Perlman would often start thinking about all these people of different backgrounds gathered together outside, sharing cigarettes and stories with each other.

"I wondered what if an unlikely friendship blossomed with people who would otherwise never have a chance to meet. That was the beginning of the long journey of writing this novel, which took 5-1/2 years."



One morning, on one of his first days on the job as a janitor at the hospital, Lamont finds Mandelbrot left outside in a wheelchair to get fresh air. Annoyed by the cigarette smoke, Mandelbrot asks Lamont to take him back to his room. Lamont, who wants to make it to his six-month probationary period without incident, is understandably reluctant. He works in Building Services, he says. It's the job of Patient Escort Services to handle patients.

But seeing as that there is no one from Patient Escort Services around, he decides to do it himself.

So begins their friendship. Lamont visits Mandelbrot after his shift, and each day Mandelbrot tells Lamont stories from his wartime experiences, beginning in the Warsaw Ghetto and ending in the crematoria of Auschwitz, where he was a Sonderkommando.

"The Sonderkommandos were made up almost entirely of Jews who were forced, under the pain of immediate death, to work in the gas chambers and crematoria of Auschwitz," Perlman explains.

Perlman did extensive research for this book, interviewing more than 15 people and visiting Poland and Auschwitz six times. It was there that his guide introduced him to the last surviving Jewish Polish survivor of the Sonderkommando.

"I was able to interview this man to get his story. The last time I went was in 2008, and he had just died. I consider myself lucky to have his story, the wartime experiences of this survivor, that formed the basis of Mandelbrot's experiences.

"Mandelbrot is desperate for people to know what happened to him and to his people," Perlman says. Mandelbrot finds that few people care anymore, not even his own grandchildren.

"You need to remember!" Mandelbrot keeps telling Lamont, who takes an unexpected interest.

The preservation of memories, is a major theme in the novel. "Memory is critically important for us as a species so that we lessen the chances that we repeat the dreadful mistakes of the past," Perlman says.

Perlman's grandparents were Russian and Polish Jews who fled Europe in the 1920s to escape the harsh economic conditions and antisemitism.

His step-grandmother, on the other hand, remained in Europe and was a survivor of Auschwitz, where she witnessed the hanging of four women for their role in the October 1944 uprising, a real incident that plays a major part in the story Mandelbrot tells Lamont. Perlman dedicates his book to these women.

Perlman also pays tribute to his great-uncle Rafal Gutman, who lived in Warsaw at the outbreak of the war. When the Jews were herded into the ghetto, the Nazis approached the community leaders to appoint someone to make a list of the order in which people were to be deported.

"My great-uncle was offered this position by the Nazis but was reluctant to do it and he committed suicide."

During one of his trips to Poland, Perlman went to the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw and found the last official record of his great-uncle's life.

"This may sound banal – it was a 1939 telephone directory that had his name, home number and street address." Perlman then tracked down the address, "and I became the first member of my family to step on the spot that used to house my father's uncle before he was taken away. So when I needed a character [during a scene in prewar Warsaw], I decided to give that character my great-uncle's name."

While the Holocaust forms the heart of this book, Perlman points out it's not just a Holocaust novel.

"It's also a story about civil rights, it's partly a love story. It's a story about history and memory and social justice, resistance, courage and unexpected kindness."

The narrative does not follow a linear, chronological path and jumps around, sometimes on the same page, between continents, characters and eras. This may jar some readers.

A paragraph that takes place in the Warsaw Ghetto may be followed by a paragraph set in a Jewish deli in postwar Chicago or a bar in present-day Hell's Kitchen.

This, and The Street Sweeper's occasional historical digressions, do not take away from its literary merit. It is layered with overlapping plot lines, powerful themes, moving descriptions and enduring characters. A very inspiring read.

Tennis Canada hires Israeli to develop players

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Tennis Canada hired top Israeli coach Oded Jacob recently to head its junior development group in British Columbia

"We are fortunate to have hired one of the best coaches in the world to identify talented youngsters in tennis," said Ryan Clark, chief executive of Tennis BC, who selected Jacob over other top candidate. "Oded will take our youngsters and turn them into international champions. You don't go out and get a guy of Oded's talent without having a lofty goal in mind."

Despite the fact Israel has less money for tennis than nations such as France, Spain or the United States, Jacob has been held in high esteem in tennis circles for his stellar achievements. He nurtured Israeli tennis players Shahar Peer, Dudi Sela and Harel Levy from their teens, helping them develop into world-class players over the past 15 years.

Jacob was instrumental in achieving several milestones for Israel. Two players he developed – Peer and Sela – led Israel to a World Group Fed Cup berth in 2008 and the 2009 Davis Cup semifinals respectively. When Peer was ranked No. 11 earlier this year, she became the highest ranked Israeli ever in tennis.

Although Jacob is elated to be working with Tennis Canada, he would never have left Israel if, in his view, the emphasis on development had been as strong now as it was in the past.

"I was proud of my work with Dudi, Harel and Shahar, but now Israel is not developing our youngsters in tennis to keep our level high for the next generation. So, with deep regret, I decided to leave Israel and will work with the Canadians as they have the right tools, attitude and outlook to develop future tennis champions," said the 46-year-old Jacob.

Oded Jacob

"Tennis Canada is looking to expand its high performance program in British Columbia, as it did in Montreal and Toronto. I am excited and eager to be a part of the program to develop Canadian youth in tennis. Of all the achievements I had in Israel, the most rewarding time was working with the youth. You see the growth right in front of your eyes, and that is exciting," Jacob added.

Ironically, some of Jacob's most noteworthy achievements with Israeli tennis players took place in Canada.

Jacob coached Levy to the most impressive result of his career when Levy finished as a finalist in the 2000 Rogers Cup (then called the Du Maurier Open) in Toronto, coming from qualifying to win six matches in a row before losing the title match to Marat Safin.

Levy's achievement was one of the best performances by an Israeli athlete. "I was especially proud of what Harel did under those circumstances. It was a shame that Harel needed hip surgery soon after that tournament, as he was ranked in the top 50 and may have gone on to have a more stellar career than he had," said Jacob.

Jacob also was the Fed Cup captain who guided Peer to two wins and Tzipi Obziler to an upset victory over Aleksandra Wozniak in an Israeli 3-0 sweep of Canada at the 2007 World Group Two playoff held in Kamloops.

Given recent success by Canadians over the past year in tennis, with Rebecca Marino and Milos Raonic both ranked in the top 50 on the professional circuits, Jacob has high expectations for the future.

"I am sure the work will pay off with a Canadian becoming an international champion soon," he said.

Former CHAT basketball star changes teams in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

HOD HASHARON, Israel — The Maccabi Hod Hasharon professional basketball team, the official farm team of Maccabi Bazan Haifa, announced it has signed power forward Jared Mintz through the 2012-13 season.

Mintz, a native of Toronto, played 12 games with Bnei Hasharon Herzliya, posting averages of 2.2 points and 2.0 rebounds in 8.5 minutes. The six-foot-nine Mintz played for NCAA Division I Lafayette College from 2007 to 2011, posting averages of 15.8 points and 5.8 rebounds per game during his senior season. He was named to the All-Patriot League First-Team during his junior and senior seasons.

Mintz, 23, made aliyah to continue his playing career in Israel.

"We are very excited to sign Jared Mintz, who has excellent potential and will have the opportunity to really develop his skills with Hod Hasharon," said head coach Rami Hadar. "Jared is a good shooter and has excellent basketball knowledge."

"Jared Mintz is a player we targeted as a prospect in the beginning of the season because of his potential and we are pleased that we can develop him in the second division," said Maccabi Bazan Haifa owner and U.S. businessmen Jeffrey Rosen. "Jared has an excellent story, being that he made aliyah, and we couldn't be more proud to add him into our program."

Mintz was a four-time MVP for the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He represented Canada in the Pan-American Maccabi Games in Chile in 2003 and in the World Maccabiah Games in Israel in 2005 and 2009.

Maccabi Haifa, an Israeli Basketball Super League team, is one of the original eight teams to form the Premier League during the 1954 season. Under Rosen's ownership, the team has earned a playoff appearance in three out of its last four seasons. Rosen bought the team in July 2007.

FUNDRAISER COMBINES a PASSION for DANCE & FASHION

Danielle Kagan
[Lindsay Nemeth photos]

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The adage "busy people get things done" certainly applies to Danielle Kagan.

The University of Toronto student is a double major in political science and Jewish studies, she's a tap and jazz dance instructor at two dance studios, she leads a Zumba class at a Curves fitness centre and she's also co-captain of U of T's Varsity Blues dance team.

But Kagan, 21, is not satisfied to rest on her laurels. She's added a new project to her list.

She's co-chairing Raise the Rhythm, a fundraiser encompassing a fashion show and contemporary dance in support of Canadian Feed the Children, a non-profit organization that works to end child poverty in Canada and in the third world.

The event, on Feb. 27 at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, will feature performances by some innovative local dance troops and "top young designers," said Kagan.

Raise the Rhythm will combine fashion and dance, two of Kagan's passions.

"It takes in everything that I love. I love fashion. I keep up-to-date with all the new designers, and I'm really involved in the dance world."

She's been dancing since she was five years old. After graduating from the dance school All That Dance at 16, she joined Vlad's Dance Company until she graduated high school.

After spending a year as a student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Kagan transferred to U of T, where she was able to continue honing her skills as a dancer on the Varsity Blues dance team.

"Now, me and my dance co-captain, Victoria Marshman, are running the [Raise the Rhythm] show," she said.

"We're choreographing all the numbers ourselves. It's gives us a lot of creativity... It's an artistic outlet from studying."

Kagan said she comes to this event with experience she gained chairing a dance and fashion show when she was a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Richmond Hill campus.

"It was really fun. I wanted to do the same thing again, but on a bigger and more professional scale."

So what's Kagan's secret for integrating this fundraising activity with her work, dance and academic responsibilities?

She says attending CHAT and dealing with the double curriculum has helped her develop excellent time-management skills.

"I'm using those skills now. Somehow, I manage to balance it all."

Choosing a beneficiary for this charitable event was a no-brainer, because Kagan's family has been supporting Canadian Feed the Children for a number of years.

"The charity does a lot of good work on different projects in Africa and Haiti. They are also providing whole food to needy children in Canada."

In fact, raising money for the organization may be becoming a family tradition, she said.

"My cousin, Elan Panov, did some terrific charity events for Canadian Feed the Children, when he was at Western [University]. I loved what they did."

Kagan says she's co-producing the show with Marshman, and Jessica Domingo.

"We brainstormed to decide what we wanted for the show... We said, 'We're all dancers. Let's throw in some professional Toronto-based dance companies.'"

Eryn Waltman, a Toronto-based choreographer who recently founded a contemporary dance company, will be performing, said Kagan.

"She has her own dance company called Conteur. I saw her show at a charity event. She's wonderful."

Also featured are "Canada's legendary beatboxer," Scott Jackson, and choreographers from a contemporary dance program called Bridge to Artists.

The audience can also expect a performance from Kagan's Varsity Blues dance team.

For the fashionistas in the crowd, local fashion designers, including Arnaldo Santos, Sheila Jobin, VerseTen, and Michelle Walmsley, will put their mark on the show.

"Arnaldo is a good friend of mine," said Kagan. "I modelled at his last charity event. He got me in contact with a lot of other up-and-coming Canadian fashion designers."

She says she's pleased with the calibre of the artists and designers who are volunteering their time.

"If people know dance and fashion in the Toronto community, these are names that you will recognize."

Kagan is already musing about making Raise the Rhythm an annual event.

"I hope that it's successful so that we can do it every year. It's a lot of work, but it's worthwhile."

Tickets for Raise the Rhythm are $25 for adults and $15 for students. For more information about the show, call 647-299-7765 or visit the website at www.raisetherhythm.com.

'You're actually a polygamist'

You know, you're actually a polygamist," I tell Meir while we sit at breakfast.

Meir seems interested. "Am I?" he asks.

"Formally, you're married to me, but actually I'm at least four, five different women," I explain.

Meir takes a sip of his coffee. "And here I was thinking it'd be an interesting conversation." He sighs.

I swallow my pride and continue. "There's Nina, the mother. She's a responsible, serious person, who tells little humans to do their homework, who shouts when things are not in order, who never wastes any punch lines on them, who never tries to charm them or to impress them, who never jokes with them because if she does, her kids right away think they're allowed to joke back and almost always some lines are crossed.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

"So this Nina just defrosts frozen dinners in the microwave. Silently. Till the end of time. Last week, mother Nina, slipped up and smiled at the kids. Their reaction? They asked if she had had her hair cut."

Meir smiles and I continue.

"There was working Nina. She was very well mannered, polite, serious and willing to please. She used to kiss behinds like there was no tomorrow and wanted to kill herself quietly in the office washroom every day. I had to get rid of her, so I quit."

Meir pats my back. I continue.

"There's Nina the friend, and here we're getting into some sub-Ninas. Like the empathetic friend who listens for hours and hours to the nagging, boring laborious stories about some annoying kids, husbands, bosses and mothers-in-law. There's also bubbly cheerful Nina, a friend who is called on to entertain and perform. She's required to deliver great jokes, anecdotes and funny stories, or else she's of no use to no one.

"There is feminist Nina, who needs to pick up the women's torch and hate all men, and there is feminine Nina, who needs to gaze at some guy's eyes and tell him how important he is and how the world would not exist without manly men."

Meir raises an eyebrow. "I don't believe I've ever been introduced to that Nina," he says. "You never told me or made me feel manly."

"We're not talking about Nina the wife," I say, explaining the obvious.

"Oh, let me help you here," he suggests chivalrously. "There's Nina the wife, who criticizes you, who shouts at you, who blames you for everything she can't do, who never laughs at your jokes, who never really listens to you, who's always angry and moody, who… well you get the picture."

I don't say anything for a long time. I finish my coffee. "I'm not talking to you," I say finally. "Ever."

Meir seems amused. "Just imagine," he says, "what would happen if some of those Nina entities were to show up in the wrong situations, huh?"

Lord, that's a frightful thought…

Be a humanitarian matchmaker

The Vietnam War came into our homes in the 1960s and '70s through the nightly news and newspaper headlines. We learned that three million Americans served in the war, 58,220 soldiers were killed and 150,000 were wounded.

We knew thousands of Americans came here to avoid the draft. We remember the fatal shooting at Kent State University, the riots at the 1968 Democratic convention in Chicago and the 1968 massacre at My Lai and platoon leader Lt. William Calley. What we don't remember is that one to three million Vietnamese were killed in the war, and how others were affected by this heinous massacre.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

One of them walked into my home the other day to install California shutters. For this column, I'll call him Thic.

Thic was born in 1960, the same year as me. He remembers all too well the corpses piled up outside his home after America changed its policy and pulled its troops out of Vietnam.

Thic told me he was "scared" throughout his childhood in Saigon. Today, he often zones out imagining that hill of loss beside his family's raised house.

"I wake up just seeing the dead people," he said as he measured my windows.

Thic is anxious. A little shirty.

Thic is tired. The elegance in his demeanour, though, reminded me of Phan Thi Kim Phúc, the little girl in the famous picture, running down a road naked near Trang Bàng, Vietnam, on June 8, 1972, after a napalm bomb was dropped on her village. I interviewed her once. She was the face of the war, but today she is mostly another forgotten survivor of another atrocious war.

I consider the people on our native reserves, in Rwanda, Cambodia, the Congo, Liberia, Sudan and in South America, where massacres were like omelettes (popular) and genocides chuckled like tricksters who pull your chair out from under you. I wondered how those people are doing, what they are fixing in people's homes and how they're sleeping.

I considered how many survivors are walking around our planet, their pain and suffering overshadowed by statistics and historical accounts of battles, the costs of the wars and their effect on our oil bills.

Our world is populated by Thics. More of them are being created every day in places like Southern Sudan, where children are being butchered once again while others are crawling into thickets with machete slashes to their heads. Their childhoods, like Thic's, have been stolen.

One day, one of those grown-up children will deliver deep-dish pizza to our home or lay some laminate down in our Florida room. He'll show up months after jumping a vessel in a Canadian harbour, after getting over his befuddlement about our sometimes careless, always blessed existence. When you see that scar on his cheek, ask him about it. (I wonder if our survivors were asked about their numbers by strangers.)

Once you've heard his story, figure he is suffering alone and that there aren't too many Sudanese or Vietnamese Spielbergs out there recording his life. Then introduce him to someone in our community, maybe a survivor or maybe an Israeli who has suffered through wars. Go past the petition you signed for Darfurians and be a humanitarian matchmaker.

Make that one of the lessons of Holocaust education, Birthright and March of the Living – to help the Thics.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut (1912 – 2012)

We were blessed he was in our midst

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

We are all blessed with the privilege of having had Rabbi Gunther Plaut in our lives, said his son Rabbi Jonathan Plaut in a eulogy at his father's funeral at Holy Blossom Temple on Sunday.

Senior rabbi at the temple from 1961 to 1977 and a senior scholar at the synagogue after that, Rabbi Gunther Plaut died on Feb. 8 after a long battle with Alzheimer's disease. He was 99.

"Holy Blossom was blessed for having had him in its midst for 51 years, blessed is the city for knowing such a leader, blessed are the immigrants for having such a champion of human rights, blessed is Israel for having such a strong supporter and blessed is God for having such a loyal servant," Rabbi Jonathan Plaut said.

Born in Germany, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, a scholar and writer, was a law student at the University of Berlin in 1934 when the Nazi party came to power.

He moved to the United States the following year, and came to Toronto in 1961 after serving as a U.S. army chaplain during the war, and a rabbi in St. Paul, Minn. He was with the American forces that went into the concentration camps and saw first hand the remnant of those brutalized by the Nazis.

In keeping with the social responsibility he taught from the pulpit, Rabbi Plaut was a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress and of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, He also helped found Toronto's Urban Alliance for Race Relations and served as vice-chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission for seven years.

Mike Keenan to coach Maccabi Canada

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Stanley Cup winner Mike Keenan has agreed to coach Maccabi Canada's hockey entry at the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Keenan will lead a team that is expected to include pros from the AHL and ECHL, as well as NCAA and junior-calibre players. They will face opposition from the United States, France and Israel as Canada tries to repeat its gold-medal performance from 1997 – the only time hockey has been a Maccabiah sport.

"I'm really excited about it. It's a place I've never been," Keenan told The CJN. "It will be a new experience, a new opportunity to learn about [Israel] first hand. It will be very interesting."

The addition of Keenan gives Maccabi Canada's hockey program instant credibility, said Alex Voihanski, general manager of the team and the primary person charged with finding players.

Keenan is a highly respected hockey man whose experience in pressure-cooker situations is second to none. In addition to winning the Stanley Cup with the New York Rangers in 1994, he coached in the finals two other times and was behind the Canadian bench in the 1987 Canada Cup. That was a team that featured superstars Wayne Gretzky, Mario Lemieux and Mark Messier in their prime – arguably the best Canadian team of all time, Voihanski said.

Winnipegger Named

LONDON — Winnipeg native Jason Marantz has been appointed chief executive at the London School of Jewish Studies (LSJS), one of the United Kingdom's most prestigious Jewish educational institutions. Marantz, 37, moved to Britain in 1999 and as CEO will work with LSJS president Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, Britain's chief rabbi. The LSJS is the U.K. Jewish community's leading institution for teacher training and adult education. Before joining the LSJS, Marantz headed London's Wolfson Hillel Jewish Primary School.

Schalits In Paris

PARIS — Former captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit and his parents met with French President Nicolas Sarkozy at the presidential palace in Paris. "We are very touched," said Noam Schalit, speaking to journalists at the Élysée Palace Feb. 8. Hours later, Schalit's parents attended the annual gala hosted by the French Jewish umbrella group CRIF. Sarkozy had met repeatedly with Gilad's father, Noam, after the young Israeli soldier, who has dual French citizenship, was captured on the border with Gaza in 2006 and held hostage there for more than five years by Hamas. During the CRIF dinner, Noam Schalit thanked Sarkozy and the French people for their efforts to help to free his son, adding that due to poor health, Gilad was not able to attend the event.

Torah Wrap Apology

ATLANTA — A Baptist bishop in Georgia has apologized for a church service in which he was wrapped in a Torah scroll and called a king. "The ceremony was not my suggestion, nor was it my intent, to participate in any ritual that is offensive in any manner to the Jewish community," Bishop Eddie Long wrote in a letter to Bill Nigut, southeast regional director of the Anti-Defamation League, according to the Atlanta Journal Constitution. Nigut released the letter on Feb. 5. In a service at the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church in Lithonia, Ga., an Atlanta suburb, earlier this month, Ralph Messer, a messianic Jew and self-described rabbi, ordered congregants to wrap Bishop Long in a Torah scroll and lift him up on a chair, bar mitzvah-style, while he held the Torah scroll, which was identified as being rescued from Auschwitz. The church has 25,000 members, and some 600,000 viewers have watched a video of the service on YouTube. Nigut told CNN the apology was "very heartfelt, sincere." Please see related story on page 18.

Celebrity Rabbi May Run For U.S. Congress

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach

NEW YORK — Rabbi Shmuley Boteach has sent a letter declaring his intent to run for the U.S. Congress in New Jersey's newly formed 9th District.

Rabbi Boteach sent the letter of intent to the offices of the Bergen County Republican Organization by the Jan. 31 deadline but has not decided definitively to run, the New Jersey Jewish Standard reported.

He would face the winner of the Democratic primary between U.S. Reps. Steve Rothman and Bill Pascrell. Two other potential Republican candidates also have submitted letters of intent, according to the PolitickerNJ website.

Rabbi Boteach told the Jewish Standard that one of the factors that will go into his decision of whether to run will be how much money he can raise for the race. He said he will make up his mind in the next two months.

He told the newspaper that he wants to "bring Jewish values into the political discourse."

Rabbi Boteach has been working, unsuccessfully so far, to get the city of Englewood, N.J., to rezone his house as a synagogue.

He is a syndicated columnist and has written several books, including a controversial new one titled Kosher Jesus, which examines Jesus' Jewish roots and which Toronto's Rabbi Immanuel Shochet declared heretical.

New non-profit to showcase Israeli artists

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jew-dos in Canada are about to become infused with a lot more Israeli flavour.

A new Toronto-based non-profit called the Motek Cultural Initiative has struck an agreement with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to help provide Israeli cultural entertainment to all manner of Jewish community galas, soirées, and campus events across the country.

Founded as the charitable arm of Motek Productions, a for-profit entertainment agency that books Israeli artists across North America, the non-profit is bringing in renowned Israeli world music group the Idan Raichel Project to launch the non-profit with a charity concert on March 18 at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre.

The federation will issue tax-receipts to donors.

The idea is to foster more awareness of and promote Israeli cultural relevancy in North America through song, music and performance, according to Ravid Dahan, president and CEO of Motek Productions and chair of the new non-profit.

"Music is the vehicle which people can use to understand Israeli culture today," she told The CJN.

Having attended numerous events put on by major Jewish community organizations to benefit Israeli causes, what struck her most was the consistent lack of "actual Israeli vibe" at each one, she said.

Ravid Dahan

Dahan, who immigrated to Canada from Israel five years ago, saw an opportunity to enlighten both Jewish and non-Jewish communities and has made it her mission to positively frame Israel as an emerging cultural hotbed and to provide that authentic vibe.

"The non-profit will help engage the next generation about all Israel has to offer through entertainment," she said. "Local organizations, while doing wonderful work to help Israel, were always choosing to use entertainment that wasn't representative of Israel."

Aside from turning North Americans on to Israeli artists, she said the Motek Cultural Initiative would also be an essential tool in the ongoing war against the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaigns and the constant vilification of Israel in western countries.

She believes her initiative will help engage the next generation of the Diaspora Jewish and expatriate Israeli communities to "win the game" in their efforts to portray Israel more positively.

"Exposing the average Canadian to Israeli music and having them interact directly with the community will result in a broader understanding and appreciation of Israeli culture globally," the Motek website states.

Dahan is in the process of assembling the rest of her board of directors and advisory board and expects to hire a full staff for the organization this year, she said.

The Motek Cultural Initiative will host a yearly gala and, starting in 2013, will organize monthly events in which Israeli artists will perform for Canadians of all faiths and cultures.

We mourn the loss

We received the news last week of the death of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut with sadness and quiet reflection.

After 99 years in this world, his soul departed.

Nearly a decade earlier, he departed from communal life with the all-too recognizable, sorrowful, incremental withdrawals into the hazy, murky, mysterious world of the Alzheimer's sufferer.

In eulogy of the great teacher, great man, great Jew that Rabbi Plaut was, I reproduce excerpts of a column about him that appeared on this page on Feb. 28, 2008 and of the editorial in The CJN on Dec. 11, 2003. The words that were written then about Rabbi Plaut are especially apt today.

In a sermon delivered on Erev Rosh Hashanah, Sept. 22, 1968, on the subject of "The Counterforce in Human History," he said: "The world cries 'Zionist' and we know they mean us and we are proud of it, we do not shrink back from it. The world cries 'Jew' and we respond, yes! God says to us, 'Where are you, My people?' On this eve of another year, we respond with one voice, 'Here I am: Thy ways are dark, the road uncertain, but I believe – and here I am." Quoted from One Voice: The Selected Sermons of W. Gunther Plaut, edited by Rabbi Jonathan V. Plaut, (Dundurn Press, 2007).

Rabbi Plaut's voice is now silent, but he still has the power to stir our hearts. Sometimes we feel enveloped by darkness, but his words are a light that still shine. I have no doubt that many of us will turn to the pages of this anthology from time to time, seeking, as we inevitably must, the strength and the courage to contend with the struggles and travails in our own lives.

From the editor's desk...

It is a rare occasion when an editorial is written about a columnist who retires. This week is such an occasion because the retiree himself is a rare individual. This newspaper, along with the entire community, owes him an irredeemably impossible debt. In keeping, therefore, with our people's long tradition of hakarat hatov, acknowledging the good that others have done for us, we pay homage to and thank Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut.

After an association with this paper that has spanned more than three decades and almost a quarter-century as a regular contributor, Rabbi Plaut is putting away his CJN pen.

In truth, however, the retirement is not entirely voluntary.

It has, alas, been forced upon him, upon us, by the cruel, incremental wearing away at his skills and abilities by Alzheimer's disease. In his typically elegant and eloquent way, Rabbi Plaut has now made that fact known to the world. He will contend with the disease as he has contended all his life with other malevolent deniers of humanity – frontally, with courage and with all his strength.

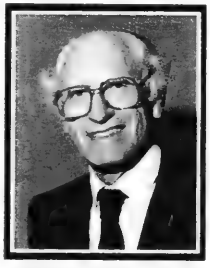
We, his community and his friends, have been the great beneficiaries of that courage and strength – and of a great deal more.

One anecdote will illustrate. It involved the widely respected Torah sage, Halachist, posek and scholar, Rabbi Gedalia Felder.

Some years ago, after Rabbi Felder had suffered a debilitating stroke, a tribute honouring the stricken rabbi and showcasing his many publications was held at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill. Though confined to a wheelchair, Rabbi Felder politely and courteously greeted the hundreds of attendees at the doorway. Rabbi Plaut was also there. When he arrived, Rabbi Plaut walked immediately over to Rabbi Felder. The two men embraced like two brothers recalling lost parents, holding each other close, lest the moment and the shared recollection slip away.

For some people, the effusive embrace was surprising. After all, the two men were very different, ideological opposites in terms of the practice of their faith. And yet, the respect and affection they felt for each other were palpable and demonstrable for all to see. And perhaps that was part of the point of their embrace. Despite their differences, these two great men embraced – for all to see.

When we wish to express our gratitude for having benefited from the countless bounties of God's wondrous and wonderful world, we usually recite a blessing. It is appropriate therefore that we thank God for giving us the gift of the example, the sagacity, the heart and the weekly columns of Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut.



Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut

"Blessed are You, Lord our God, King of the universe who has shared of His wisdom with those who revere Him and who has given of His wisdom to [his creations of] flesh and blood."

Now that we mourn the loss of Rabbi Plaut, it is, alas, appropriate to add may the memory of this righteous individual be for blessing.

New Reform synagogue set to open downtown

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Two months after her Nov. 30 retirement as director of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein is hyped about her current project: a new shul in downtown Toronto.

The City Shul, to be launched on the High Holidays, will be the first Reform congregation south of Holy Blossom Temple. It will serve people in the area bounded by St. Clair Avenue, Queen Street, Yonge Street and Dufferin Street. Its location is yet to be determined.

Paul Leszner, president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and chair of the URJ Canada steering committee, told The CJN that downtown Toronto, with its many young adults and empty nesters, has become "increasingly in need of a Reform congregation.

"With all the new condos, it has become an area that people are moving to."

According to UIA Federations Canada's 2009 National Task Force of Jewish Demographics, downtown Toronto's Jewish population numbers more than 16,000 people.

Leszner noted that there are "a tremendous number" of unaffiliated Jews in the area.

"We're constantly looking to build Reform Judaism," Leszner said, adding that in the United States, the Reform movement is the largest Jewish denomination, but it is the smallest in Canada.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

The City Shul will be the second Reform congregation to open in the GTA in a short period. Neshamah Congregation opened in Thornhill Woods last summer.

Jeff Cipin, who has attended Rabbi Goldstein's High Holiday services with his wife Aviva for the past 15 years, is on the leadership team of the new shul. He has lived near St. Clair and Christie Street since the mid-1980s. "I was one of those people who was always hoping [Rabbi Goldstein] would do something like this, but it was a non-starter because of her commitment to Kolel.

"Her services are very laid-back, lots of fun, very enjoyable, very participatory," he said. "And it's obvious she's a learned person. There's a scholarly side to her."

For Rabbi Goldstein – who was ordained 28 years ago and spent three years as assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom and five years as a congregational rabbi in Boston before establishing Kolel 20 years ago – it would be more typical to go to an established congregation at this stage in her career.

But the 56-year-old rabbi, a spinning class afficionado with a mass of greying curls, describes herself as "a starter" who likes grass-roots projects. "God has blessed me with a lot of energy," she said.

In addition to her current project, she serves as a volunteer rabbi in Guatemala three to four times a year, leads Jewish tours to Israel and abroad, and is working on a book about spirituality and senility.

Rabbi Goldstein, who grew up in Queens, N.Y., also has a passion for downtown living, having moved with her husband and family to the Annex three years ago. "It's like I'm 10 years younger. I bike everywhere. I walk everywhere. I love it. I'm sorry I didn't do it 20 years ago."

Three things influenced her decision to return to the pulpit: her move downtown, her youngest child's departure for university, and her sabbatical in Israel a couple of years ago.

While there, she was inspired by the small, intimate Reform congregations that she attended. She describes them as "amazing... soulful, with singing and real learning going on. You felt the sense of community."

She sees the new shul as a "model of engagement that people will be creating together."

Among the first items on her agenda will be empowering people to lead services and putting together a cadre of people who will be able to deliver divrei Torah.

Her vision includes a monthly service for adults, followed by dinner and Torah-related discussion.

As well, she envisions family services, with "lots of activity, lots of music and real engagement of the kids." Plans for the younger generation include an afternoon school, with Hebrew taught separately in "cluster groups" for people who live near each other, and a bar and bat mitzvah program that the rabbi would teach.

"We're like a chavurah meets an adult education centre meets a Jerusalem Reform synagogue... it's a marriage of a lot of ideas."

An informational meeting will be held March 1, at 7:30 p.m. at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, 36 Harbord St.

As well, the shul, together with the Al Green Theatre, will hold a concert March 5 as an "awarenèss raiser" at the theatre. The event, titled "Jewish and Arabic Music in Dialogue," will feature Lenka Lichtenberg and Roula Said. Tickets are $20. For details, go to algreentheatre.ca or call 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

There will also be a family Purim Megillah reading March 7 and an adult Purim seudah March 8 at the Wolfond Centre, as well as two sample Shabbat services in May.

For more information, visit cityshul.com, e-mail thecityshul@gmail.com, or call 647-799-3557.

Beth Tikvah implements Torah egalitarianism

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Women took part in the Torah service at Beth Tikvah Synagogue this past Shabbat for the first time ever at the Conservative shul.

The change was timed to coincide with the congregation's annual Sisterhood Shabbat, after congregants voted in favour of implementing "Torah egalitarianism" at a special general meeting last week. The move allows women to participate in all aspects of the Torah service, including aliyot (except the first two), hagbah (lifting the Torah) and gelilah (tying and dressing), and leading the Torah service.

Rabbi Howard Markose

The decision was the culmination of a process that began last year, when the 1,100-family congregation asked Rabbi Howard Markose for his position on women's ritual participation. The process continued with a congregational survey, town hall meetings, educational sessions and focus groups.

Last September, Rabbi Markose became the congregation's interim senior rabbi and, as such, its halachic decisor. Rabbi Wayne Allen is on sabbatical and will retire in June.

In January, the synagogue's board of governors adopted resolutions in favour of implementing Torah egalitarianism, as recommended by its ritual committee, and the congregational vote was held at a special general meeting Feb. 7. There were 230 people at the meeting, and 83 per cent of the 224 voters were in favour of the change.

Arlene Anthony, Beth Tikvah's immediate past sisterhood president, said the shul has been examining the role of women and ritual for many years.

In 1981, an adult education series on women and ritual was organized under the auspices of Rabbi Avraham Feder, the shul's first rabbi. As a result, some changes were implemented, including Saturday morning bat mitzvahs.

Over the years, various speakers have addressed the issue, which arose again last year because of the change in rabbinic leadership.

"We were hoping this would all happen in time for Sisterhood Shabbat," Anthony said. Betty Rumberg, age 100, was scheduled the first of three women to receive an aliyah to the Torah.

Merle Goldman – a past president of the congregation, and its first female president – said she is very excited to see Torah egalitarianism at Beth Tikvah. Goldman was part of the 1981 committee that organized the first adult education series on women and ritual.

"If we're going to survive as a Conservative synagogue in Toronto, we had to do this," she added.

Rabbi Markose told The CJN in a phone interview from Israel that he advised the congregation last year that it is permissible for women to have aliyot, to read from the Torah and to take part in all aspects of the Torah service.

However, he said that counting women in a minyan or having them lead a service is forbidden.

Rabbi Markose said that anything forbidden or obligatory is not open to debate, but if something is permissible, the congregation has a responsibility to determine whether to implement it.

He said that Torah participation by women is found in the Talmud and also in later rabbinic works. It wasn't his mandate to make the change or encourage women's participation, he said, just to provide a halachic ruling that would allow the congregation to make a decision. He also educated congregants on the issue in a variety of forums.

"I'm happy that the will of the community was done, because this is something they wanted and we were able to find a halachic way."

The argument of kavod hatzibur (respect due to the congregation), often used to justify women not participating, is "one that the congregation can determine itself how it understands it," the rabbi said.

In 21st-century Canada, he noted, men and women have equal opportunities for Torah learning, and day school is open to both boys and girls from a very early age. The argument of kavod hatzibur "does not obtain in our day for Beth Tikvah."

When it comes to being counted in a minyan, however, "even though there have been responsa written by my colleagues in the Conservative movement, I have not found a way to see the full halachic validity in their tshuvot," Rabbi Markose said.

Although more than 80 per cent of the voters were in favour of Torah participation – the same percentage as in a congregational survey last summer – others have expressed disappointment that women will not be counted in the minyan, or – conversely – that things are not staying as they were, the rabbi added.

Robert Weill, Beth Tikvah's president, said the survey was sent to each individual member, and almost 40 per cent responded, "a very large return."

"Sisterhood Shabbat is a very appropriate time to do it," he said. "And if we're going to do it, why delay?"

Abbas harms his own

Mahmoud Abbas harms his own people. Time and again, the Palestinian Authority president shows a truer ambition than the faux aspiration he pretends with western leaders of wanting to peacefully end the conflict with Israel. The latest evidence of his transparent, anti-negotiation scheming should overwhelm the skeptic. Two events last week are persuasive. The question for those of his people who wish to see through his charade and are themselves tired of Abbas' constant dissembling is whether the current impasse with Israel that he has created can be surmounted.

Speaking to a gathering of foreign ministers of the Arab League in Cairo on Sunday, Abbas effectively put an end to the bilateral talks with Israel that the members of the Quartet imploringly encourage. Again, he railed against Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and reiterated his mantra-like demand that Israel freeze all construction in the settlements and agree, before they sit across the table, to negotiate based on 1967 borders. Yet he knows that Israel cannot start negotiations from a point that, a priori, cedes control to him of a unified Jerusalem. And he also knows that Netanyahu did indeed recently agree to freeze new construction outside the existing communities.

Abbas issued his tired, but deadly, ultimatum that unless the Jewish state accedes to his two preconditions, he will renew unilateral efforts to obtain statehood in the United Nations. Such a step, he also knows, violates every commitment he and his predecessor have ever made to Israel and the United States. One week earlier, Abbas signed an agreement in Doha with Hamas leader Khaled Meshal to bring the terrorist organization into the PA fold.

Meshal however gave quite the illuminating insight for agreeing to reconcile with the Fatah faction of the PA. He told Al Jazeera television that the Palestinians wanted to accomplish unity and move forward "to resist the enemy [Israel] and achieve our national goal" (our emphasis). His meaning is entirely without ambiguity. He did not even couch his meaning in code. While Meshal was making his ambitions clear to the world in Doha, his co-leader of Hamas, Ismail Haniyeh, told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran that Hamas would never recognize the State of Israel.

How can Israel merely shrug its shoulders at this latest tactic by Abbas and accept the mischief and the mendacity? How can the countries of the West that consider Hamas to be a terrorist organization shrug their shoulders and merely accept what Abbas did last week?

Once again, Abbas has embarrassed and humiliated an American president, one perhaps more inclined than any of his predecessors to be the wind at the back of the Palestinian sails to statehood. Once again he has harmed his own people. Once again, Abbas has set back the cause of Palestinian independence.

Hate speech as 'free speech' (1)

I was at the "talk" by Zafar Bangash ("Wiesenthal Center objects to McMaster speaker," Feb. 2) The McMaster University administration has nothing to be proud of in cowardly defending hate speech as nothing more than inoffensive "free speech." We witnessed Bangash equating Zionism with Nazism, threatening that things could become uncontrollably violent against Jews in Canada were war to break out between the West and Iran, and defending the totalitarian state of Iran. Iran is a country that oppresses minorities and supports terror groups targeting Israel and the West. It is a country that has killed and tortured Iranian protesters wanting freedom from the tyranny of the mullahs. It is a country that is developing nuclear weapons despite Bangash's sycophancy, denials and unnatural loyalty to the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Hate speech as 'free speech' (2)

At McMaster University, pro-Iranian, anti-Israel speaker Zafar Bangash spewed his propaganda and afterward took questions, turning it into a Q and BS event, if he even bothered to answer inconvenient questions pointing to his hypocrisy and lies ("Wiesenthal Center objects to McMaster speaker," Feb. 2). That is the true threat that many people either don't grasp or gloss over – the freedom to propagate lies and spread hate. Such lectures are ideal venues for disseminating hateful and distorted narratives. In order for truth to prevail, there has to be an opportunity for informed response! Universities have shirked their responsibilities by hiding from conflict under the false banner of "freedom of speech," while not doing anything whatsoever to ensure that what is being said is factual, not hateful and honestly open to be challenged. That is a lazy, cowardly and immature way of governance from those responsible for mentoring young minds.

Disingenuous article

I found the perspectives piece "Why do some Jews think Obama is evil?" (Feb. 2) totally disingenuous. The writer attributes, through third persons, all sorts of hideous characteristics to U.S. President Barack Obama. For example, "'I think Obama's overriding goal is to have Israel destroyed,' said Randy Silver, a businessman from Glenview, Ill." Who is Silver that makes him quotable? There are other similar quotes attributed to faceless individuals, on whether Obama is a Muslim (please, can we put that canard to bed already?), whether he hates Jews and so on. Just pure garbage. This article was not worthy of publication. If you are going to publish this type of tripe, at least say that your newspaper does not necessarily agree with the views of the author.

What men are saying

In the article "Siddur from 1471 reveals gender flexibility" (Jan. 19), the point of reference is the morning prayers, including the blessing for not having made me a woman. At the beginning of prayer, we say blessings for having not made me a gentile, for having not made me a slave and for having not made me a woman. Women, because of family responsibilities, aren't bound by obligations that are controlled by time. They still have an obligation to pray, but not necessarily with a minyan. What men are actually saying in these beginning prayers is not thank goodness that they have not been made these despicable creatures, but that they are so happy that they have an obligation to pray.

Yorkshire article brought back memories

What a wonderful surprise to read Melody Wren's beautiful article "Explore the charm of Yorkshire" (Jan. 19). Cockney-born and bred in Stepney, London (U.K.) East End, I was invited at the end of the war in Europe, in 1945, to visit a dear friend living in Leeds. Heartfelt thanks, Melody! You brought back marvellous memories, and you are so right – being driven through Yorkshire's moors and dales was breathtaking, and it's the best way to experience and enjoy the "must-see" Fountains Abbey, Helmsley, White Chalk Horse, Whitby, Robin Hood's Bay and Boggle Hole. How timely and welcome to read your descriptive article, full of cheer, love and warmth – so needed on this cold and frosty day.

'Chazak v'ematz'

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut's last words to The CJN readers

This was Rabbi Gunther Plaut's last regular column for The CJN. Dec. 11, 2003. He was a columnist for The CJN for 23 years and associated with the paper for more than 30.

One of the fundamental experiences of being human is being subject to physical and mental problems. Rabbis are no exception. I don't hesitate to tell you that last month I celebrated my 91st birthday, which means I still have a long way to go if I am to equal my mother's journey.

From her I learned that getting old does not necessarily mean wilting away like a dying flower, but now that I am old, I realize that I once took for granted that the youthful alertness of my own mind would last forever, and hopefully be paralleled by my physical capacity. I had passed my 90th birthday, and at first everything seemed to remain the same. But then, one problem after another began to assail me. But that was minor, of course, compared to what happened to my beloved Elizabeth, my mate of 65 wonderful and productive years. As you know, she became ill several years ago and was finally claimed by the Angel of death only a few months ago. Her illness, and now her death, has left me in a state of desolation that I have never before experienced.

In addition, I have come to feel in this last while that I was strangely debilitated. Not only did I have physical problems – I had expected them - but my mind too was not functioning with its usual alacrity. I did not seem to be able to make decisions, and when I finally made them, I often did not carry them out. I did not know why this was happening, and therefore sought medical help.

The diagnosis was that I now suffer, like many people my age - and some younger - from Alzheimer's disease. And I want you, my friends and readers, to know this straight from me.

So, like everyone else, regardless of age or health, I now face a basic question: how exactly, can I do my best in waging a battle against Alzheimer's disease and, of course, for life?

The answer, simple though it may seem, is best expressed by the brief Hebrew expression chazak v'ematz. I will attempt to be as strong as possible and muster up as much courage as possible, knowing that much has been given to me in life and knowing, as well, that much is in the hands of the Almighty.

And, my friends, I would say the same to you, in whatever battle you must wage for life and for health: chazak v'ematz, be strong and be of good courage, and may you and I be granted the privilege of living for as long as our strength and God afford us.

'The greatest danger to human rights is... indifference'

The following teachings by Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut are excerpted from A Rabbi of Words and Deeds: Esssays in Honour of the 90th Birthday of W. Gunther Plaut, edited by John Moscowitz and Natalie Fingerhut (Holy Blossom Temple, 2002).

On belief in God

I believe that God's possibilities of connecting and caring are endless in space and in time. There is an essential mystery here that will always lie beyond my comprehension. If I cannot fathom how a piece of silicon can perform its tasks, how much more reason do I have to stand in awe before the presence of the One who made the world and its resources and put them at our disposal! This sense of awe and wonder, said Abraham Joshua Heschel, should be the basis of one's religious outlook. It is of mine.

The God who suffered and wept with us during the Holocaust is my God. To say this is a statement of faith and admittedly not grounded on scientific proof. But that does not make it any less real.

(Excerpt from God, Where Were You? Keeping Faith After Auschwitz)

On the importance of defending human rights

Diversity is an affirmation of individual human rights, of pride in one's heritage.

Racism is the very opposite of this sentiment, and the more frankly we confront it, the better our national health will be...

It must be clear that the state, as the collective entity of the people, has a vital role to play. It guards the political and human fabric of Canada, and our nation itself has traditions that need to be respected. In this role it must guard the human rights of all, of those who have been here and of those are arriving. It is meant to emphasize that our human-rights legislation on the federal and provincial levels are cornerstones on the moral edifice that is Canada.

Nov. 10, 1938, [Kristallnacht] saw the modern breakdown of human rights and Dec. 10, 10 years later [the signing of the International Declaration of Human Rights] saw the international resolution to entrench them once and for all. But we cannot put our trust in the mere existence of the document that we are celebrating today. Without our resolve to give it flesh and blood, it will be little more than a pious and pretentious exercise.

Let it not be forgotten that in 1938 there were millions of "good people" in the world. By their collective outcry, they could have curbed the rapacious beast the Nazis had loosed on humanity. Alas, they said little and did nothing. The same is true for Germans who saw the evil perpetrated before their eyes, yet chose to look the other way. A few gathered their strength and helped the victims, but they were the rare exceptions.

Do we not find the same scenario when it comes to standing up for the underprivileged in our society? The German burghers claimed that they did not know what was going on – a rather shallow excuse at best. But when it comes to the poor, no one can say that he/she does not know of poverty's gruesome embrace, of the unending and repetitive cycle that is producing a permanent underclass. Still, most of us do nothing and look away, somehow deluding ourselves that the state will jump into the breach and take up the slack left by our own indifference.

One of our former national leaders, annoyed by the persistent reminder that the weak had to be protected, called those of us who had nagged him "soft-bellied do-gooders" or something to that effect.

"Do-gooder" was meant to be the ultimate put-down. Not in my book – and I'd like think not in the book of the majority of Canadians, either. Making the social weal one's concern is not the sole prerogative of the politician; it is the duty of every citizen. When human rights are abridged or trampled under foot, the blame lies not alone with the offenders. It lies also, and to no small degree, with those who could have stood up for human rights but didn't.

In fact, to put it bluntly, perhaps the greatest danger to human rights is the indifference of decent people. Our collective experience should teach us this basic, though uncomfortable, truth. Solidarity in defence of human rights in all their forms and guises is the best safeguard of democracy and social peace. It is as simple and as complex as that.

(Excerpt from Our Collective Experience in Human Rights and Solidarity: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow)

Haredi draft deferment a ticking time bomb

Nothing infuriates average Israelis more than the exemption most haredi men get from military service. While other high school graduates spend several years in the IDF, often endangering themselves for Israel's security, most similarly aged haredi young people continue their lives uninterrupted.

This arrangement is based on an understanding reached during Israel's early years between David Ben-Gurion, our first prime minister, and the heads of leading haredi yeshivas. It allowed yeshiva students to defer military service until concluding their studies, essentially exempting them from service.

The haredi rationale is that while soldiers might fight and die for the country, yeshiva students are the Jewish nation's true torchbearers. Throughout history, it's only because of them that Judaism has survived, and since history is cyclical and there's no guarantee Israel will continue to exist, they alone ensure that Judaism will outlive Zionism.

This thinking doesn't sit well with non-haredi Israelis. They view haredim as freeloaders. They not only refuse to contribute to state security, but their way of life makes them welfare cases. They don't work, have countless children and live off the state's coffers.

Over the years, the country's leadership, whether left or right, has avoided changing the status quo regarding haredi enlistment in the IDF, recognizing the issue as a political hot potato. The only changes made were forced upon governments by the courts.

The most significant legal battle on the matter took place more than a decade ago, as it became clear the number of yeshiva students receiving deferments was skyrocketing.

Yair Lootsteen

in Jerusalem

When Ben-Gurion agreed to deferments, military service was delayed for no more than a few hundred students. In 1999, almost 4,000 yeshiva students received delays, roughly nine per cent of all potential enlistees for that year, bringing the total number of students with deferments to more than 30,000.

Moreover, the deferment system had negative socio-economic ramifications for the haredi community. It kept many in yeshivas and out of the workforce, even after exhausting their Torah studies, because they were neither willing nor able to join the IDF at a later stage in life. Instead, they lingered in yeshivas and kept getting government handouts.

Based on the numbers and the arrangement's societal effects, Israel's Supreme Court found the situation to be no longer acceptable. Simply stated, the principle of equality requiring all able-bodied persons to participate in Israel's security outweighed the freedom of religion claimed by haredim. As such, the court found the deferment system no longer reasonable and, therefore, illegal.

However, the court understood it could not annul the existing arrangement immediately. Instead, it gave the government and Knesset a year to incorporate haredim into the military.

As is often the case, a committee was established, headed by retired Supreme Court Justice Zvi Tal. In April 2000, it produced a voluminous report that led to what is known in Israel as the Tal Law. It did not do away with yeshiva students' right to continue studying. Rather, it created a year-long window of opportunity for 22-year-olds, allowing those who stopped studying to choose to enlist into the IDF for a shortened term of service or to return to yeshiva.

The law also created a civilian service as an alternative to the military. Anyone serving for a year in this service (in a variety of needed positions) would get a permanent exemption from military service.

Acting on the Tal committee's recommendations, the law's validity was limited to five years, requiring the Knesset to re-evaluate it periodically. Although challenged in the courts in 2007, the law was extended for another five years. It's scheduled to end in this coming July.

During the past decade, the law has only been partially successful in integrating more haredim into the IDF and Israeli society in general. While several thousand have joined the army or civilian service during that decade, in 2010 alone, more than 5,000 new yeshiva students received deferments and their total numbers reached 60,000.

With reserve soldiers already protesting the Tal Law's extension, and with the issue threatening to dismantle his coalition, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu delayed a government debate on it, choosing instead to send it to the Knesset and announcing there would be amendments to the law before July.

With stats showing 28 per cent of Jewish first-graders enrolled this year in haredi schools, someone had better start being more creative. There's no time to waste.

'Critical solidarity' - Israel bashing by another name

I have heard many excuses for crude anti-Israel propaganda, but the term "critical solidarity" is new. This is the phrase that Germany's Heinrich Böll Foundation used in the effort to justify channelling money to a particularly poisonous web magazine that goes under the name "+972" – the international dialing code for Israel.

Many of the posts on the site exploit the odious "apartheid" analogy that is central to the 2001 Durban strategy, designed to promote the "complete international isolation of Israel" – in other words, annihilation by political warfare.

Published in English, few Israelis read +972 and many of the writers are from the tiny fringe anti-Zionist sect of Israelis and Jews who have failed to gain attention and influence through the democratic process and resort to inflammatory rhetoric to attack Israeli policies.

In one typical example, in January 2012, Haggai Matar wrote "Dozens of Popular Committee activists gathered in Jericho for a 'freedom ride': an attempt to drive their cars to Ramallah on the fast lanes of the apartheid roads meant for Israelis only." Similarly, Noam Sheizaf, uses +972 to declare his religious belief that the IDF is the "main institution in promoting, maintaining occupation, apartheid." And Joseph Dana, who masquerades as a journalist, proclaimed, "I am opposed to the exclusive nature of Zionism and the privilege that it affords one people in this region." No wonder that Ali Abunimah, the head of Electronic Intifada and a leader of hate-filled anti-Israel events on North American campuses, is a big supporter.

This website is not the only form of anti-democratic manipulation and warfare funded by the German Böll Foundation. Its Israeli partners include Ta'ayush, an anarchist group that provokes violent confrontations in the West Bank. Another partner is Yesh Gvul, which is involved in lawsuits in Europe targeting Israeli officials that are responsible for counter-terror operations against Hamas. In the European Parliament, the group has sponsored highly biased presentations on "anti-democratic trends in Israel." And in January, it sent a letter to members of the Israeli Knesset opposing very preliminary proposals that would have placed limits on their and other foreign government funding for political advocacy NGOs. Apparently, the officials of these foreign foundations think that they're the real democrats, and not the elected officials chosen by the Israeli public.

What is a German political institution (the Böll Foundation is associated with the Green Party, and is funded by taxpayers) doing supporting this modern version of colonialism and antisemitism?

Their official response is that this funding was a form of "critical solidarity with Israel." George Orwell would have been proud – the phrase implies that hate speech and calls for the destruction of Israel are actually signs of support for and solidarity with the Jewish nation-state.

Gerald Steinberg

in Jerusalem

Böll also said it did not want to "censor" +972, as if censorship, and not funding, was the issue. By this warped logic, money given to any cause, no matter how marginal and immoral, is justifiable – there are no limits. It is hard to decide what is worse – the activities and funding or the absurd and insulting explanation.

Böll officials might also argue that they are only following the other German organizations and European governments, such as Norway and Sweden, in this form of "critical solidarity." Tens of millions of taxpayers' euros are given to fringe anti-Israel groups that work against the peace efforts that the governments claim to support. These groups are also active in promoting the demonization of Israel, and their publications repeat the libels of Israeli "apartheid," "genocide," "colonization," "massacre," and "ethnic cleansing."

If officials from Germany's Heinrich Böll Foundation and the rest retain any sense of decency and self-respect, they will end this immoral funding immediately and apologize for the damage done to Israel by their "critical solidarity." Europeans, in general, and German groups, in particular, have no right to manipulate Israeli democracy or to preach to Israelis on any issue.

Peace remains elusive

With Israeli President Shimon Peres having recently warned that not much time remains to reach a peace agreement with the Palestinians, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has expressed pessimism about the prospect of such a breakthrough.

Days after Israeli and Palestinian negotiators ended their fifth and apparently final round of exploratory talks in Amman, Jordan, without any discernible progress, Netanyahu glumly observed, "As things stand now, the signs are not particularly good."

He issued his comment about a month after Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, claimed that Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) are at least a decade away from making peace, that the PA is trying to "flee direct negotiations" and "internationalize" the Arab-Israeli dispute, and that Israel should pursue conflict management rather than conflict resolution.

Unsurprisingly, the Palestinians are not hopeful either.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas has blamed Israel for the unsuccessful outcome of the talks in Jordan, which were sponsored by King Abdullah II. In the meantime, Abbas' aides have dismissed Israel's proposals for border and security arrangements within the context of a two-state solution as a non-starter.

At the recent discussions in Jordan, Israel's representative, Yitzhak Molho, told his Palestinian interlocutors that the guiding principle of Israeli policy is to delineate a border based on the route of its separation barrier, some parts of which jut deeply into the West Bank. Israel unilaterally seeks to retain settlement blocs near Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, maintain control of eastern Jerusalem and keep a garrison in the Jordan Valley.

The Palestinian position is far different, as its chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, noted: "Our starting point is the 1967 borders, with minor [territorial] swaps."

Since the Palestinian view is supported by the Quartet – the United States the European Union, Russia and the United Nations – Israel is isolated on this issue.

The talks in Amman, which began on Jan. 3 and turned out to be yet another exercise in futility, were convened as a result of efforts by the Quartet to reinvigorate the moribund peace process.

The previous round of negotiations, ceremonial in nature and little more than an ostentatious display in public relations, broke down in the autumn of 2010 following Netanyahu's refusal to extend Israel's 10-month partial settlement freeze in the West Bank.

Netanyahu feared that his right-wing coalition, some of

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

whose ministers oppose territorial compromise, would collapse if he agreed to renew it.

Digging in their heels, the Palestinians served notice they would not resume formal negotiations unless Israel abided by two conditions: a total settlement moratorium in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem, and a new border based on the pre-1967 lines.

Netanyahu urged the PA to resume talks without preconditions, even though Israeli preconditions run the gamut from preserving settlement blocs to maintaining possession of eastern Jerusalem.

Much to Israel's satisfaction, the Quartet supported its call for an unconditional resumption of talks. However, the Quartet asked Israel for two confidence-building measures – the release of Palestinian prisoners and a complete halt to West Bank settlement construction, which is widely regarded as an obstacle to advancing peace.

Last October, the Quartet urged Israel and the PA to produce substantive proposals within three months. According to reports, the Palestinians submitted a detailed paper, but Israel has yet to do so.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon

At the moment, Israel is preoccupied by Iran and the spectre of an Iranian nuclear arsenal. To Netanyahu, the Palestinian question seems secondary by comparison.

The foreign minister of the European Union, Catherine Ashton, has called for a continuation of the Amman talks so they can develop into "genuine negotiations."

And while Israel agrees with her approach, few observers are hopeful that the current Israeli government would be willing, or even able, to match concessions offered in 2008 by Ehud Olmert, Israel's former prime minister, before he was forced to resign in a cloud of scandal. Olmert's far-reaching concessions turned on a massive Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and a division of greater Jerusalem.

It is highly doubtful whether Netanyahu would be able to realistically offer such concessions. They would be at odds with his intrinsic views and hasten the fall of his government. Netanyahu's other conditions also pose problems. He wants the Palestinians to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, even though the PLO has already recognized Israel, and he wants the PA to cancel last week's Fatah/Hamas pact to form an interim unity government in advance of elections. The PA is unlikely to budge on either issue.

Peacemaking is also inhibited by two additional factors: the uncertainty unleashed by the so-called Arab Spring – the series of rebellions that have rocked the Arab world since 2011 – and the Palestinians' ability to fire rockets into Israel at will from the Gaza Strip.

Netanyahu argues that Arab revolts necessitate the need for upgraded Israeli security guarantees to offset the risk of the land-for-peace formula. Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak says Israel cannot afford to vacate much of the West Bank unless Israel develops credible anti-missile capabilities.

In the face of these harsh realities, the PA is adopting "new measures" in pursuit of statehood. Abbas, having described Netanyahu as the most inflexible Israeli leader he has ever met, acknowledges that the PA is preparing a diplomatic campaign to place Israel under "a real international siege" at the United Nations and other forums.

The PA intends to ask the UN Security Council to take up the matter of Israeli settlement activity in the West Bank. Last September's bid by the PA for full UN membership has bogged down, having been sidelined by the United States. But the PA's latest gambit concerning Israeli settlements may fall on fertile ground.

Two weeks ago, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon urged Israel to "refrain from future construction" in the West Bank. Shortly afterward, the United States criticized plans by Israel to subsidize construction in 70 settlements.

Israel is paying no heed to these motions. In the wake of UNECSO's decision to grant the PA membership, a stinging setback and rebuke to Israel, Netanyahu announced that 2,000 housing units would be constructed in eastern Jerusalem, Gush Etzion and Ma'aleh Adumim.

This announcement buoyed Likud stalwarts who are not eager to make meaningful compromises and served notice on the PA that Israel will respond aggressively to Palestinian unilateralism.

A year and a half ago, in an upbeat mood, Netanyahu enunciated an ambitious agenda, saying he hoped to sign a "historic" framework accord with the PA within a year. But this deadline has come and gone, and now an agreement seems beyond the reach of Israel and the PA.

Observers do not expect the stagnation to touch off a third violent Palestinian uprising. In a disavowal of violence, Abbas has called on Palestinians in the West Bank to engage in peaceful protests through the medium of "popular resistance." Abbas' probable successor, Marwan Barghouti, facing the prospect of spending the rest of his life in prison after being convicted on charges of terrorism, has been converted to a belief in non-violence.

In a remarkable comment that may be the harbinger of a new Palestinian strategy, he declared that the Palestinians committed a grave error by resorting to force during the second intifadah.

UJA campaign ahead of last year's pace

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has raised more than $50 million in unrestricted gifts and almost $54 million total, in its 2012 campaign, Gilbert Palter, UJA Campaign 2012 co-chair with Barbara Bank, announced at last week's campaign closing.

The campaign is "almost $2 million ahead of where we were last year at this time." Palter told an audience of more than 700 people. The event, held Feb. 9 at Events on the Park, featured comedian Richard Lewis of Curb Your Enthusiasm.

Bank noted that, this year, the campaign has 1,500 new donors and donors who had not made gifts in recent years. Together, they provided more than $1.7 million to the campaign.

Palter said one of the most profound things he learned this year is that "the high quality of Jewish life that we all enjoy in Toronto exists largely because of the strength of our UJA campaign.

"UJA helps people in need here in Toronto, in Israel and around the world, and builds the Jewish identity of our youth." As well, he added, it provides them with Jewish education, and advocates for Jewish and Israeli causes.

Co-chairs for the 2013 campaign will be Sarena Koschitzky and Bruce Leboff.

Speakers at the closing included Alison Himel, chair of Campaign 2012 operations; Felicia Posluns, outgoing chair of UJA women's philanthropy, who also introduced Lewis, and Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of the board of UJA Federation.

A brief tribute was paid to Reform Jewish leader Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who had died the previous day.

Felicia Posluns, who will chair Women's Philanthropy for the 2013 campaign, introduced Lewis, whose hour-long act featured a disclaimer on the program. "While we have made every effort to ensure this event is suitable for all ages, please keep in mind that UJA has no control over the content of Richard Lewis' program," it read.

The New York-born, Hollywood-based actor/comedian, 64, recalled meeting Curb creator Larry David as a 12-year-old at a summer sports camp. They hated each other, he said.

The enthusiastic audience applauded at Curb references, and also when Lewis, a self-admitted drug addict and alcoholic, said he's been sober for 18 years.

His stream-of-consciousness routine included numerous Jewish references. He also made a point of mentioning that his wife, who he married in his late fifties, is Jewish.

"Judaism is so beautiful," he said. "I don't have a big family, so to be with a lot of Jews... I like it. I can't always share anecdotal stories."

As well, Lewis incorporated material on aging – some parts more family-friendly than others. "I've been really restrained up here. You have no clue," he said.

"If you're young, have a blast," he advised those in their 20s and 30s. "It really flies."

Why I joined The Canadian Peres Center For Peace...

"I've always believed in peace and coexistence but until I was introduced to President Shimon Peres' approach and The Center For Peace he established, I hadn't fully appreciated the importance of also pursuing dignity and building a civil society. That is the mission and vision of The Peres Center For Peace with its innovative humanitarian projects and programs. That's why I have accepted to lead its Canadian Center."

The bizarre lexicon of Mideast reporting

Last week in Doha, Qatar, Fatah and Hamas officials announced that they had finally reached an agreement on the formation of a "unity" government. Despite the intense focus on the ongoing massacres in Syria, abetted by Russia and Iran, this development captured quite a bit of media attention.

Much of the coverage failed to explain the inconsistencies (even contradictions) in the agreement itself, including the place of the two factions in the international community and the opposing views they hold toward relations with Israel.

For instance, the Feb. 7 Toronto Star carried a Washington Post report which noted: "The European Union, one of the major financial backers of the Palestinian Authority, said it looked forward to continuing its support, provided the new government was committed to non-violence, recognized Israel and accepted previous agreements and a negotiated peace settlement with Israel" – conditions long ago set out by the Mideast Quartet, of which the EU is a member.

"Hamas, which for years carried out deadly suicide bombings and has fired rockets into Israel, rejects those conditions. Hamas is considered a terrorist group by Israel, Canada, the U.S. and the EU," the Post report said.

How, then, can such an alliance hope to function?

Some have tried to square the circle by assuming that the new government will be solely composed of politically independent "technocrats," with Hamas having no direct role. The Post piece notes, for instance, that "Yasser Abed Rabbo, a senior aide to Abbas, said the joint government would be 'a technical government more than a political one' and that diplomatic affairs would 'remain with the presidency and the Palestine Liberation Organization.'"

Few, including very few Israelis, buy into this notion.

As to what motivated PA President Mahmoud Abbas to strike an agreement with Hamas, consider this explanation from Ibrahim Barzak and Karen Laub in their Canadian Press report (Feb. 7): "Abbas appears to have concluded that he has a better chance of repairing relations with Hamas, shunned by the West as a terror group, than reaching an agreement with Israel's hardline prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu."

This is a constant refrain in major western media circles. Netanyahu is depicted as "hardline" whereas Abbas is (as implied here) the "moderate" peace-seeker. According to other reporters, Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal is a "relative moderate." This lexicon is bizarre. Whatever the criticisms against Netanyahu (who has been challenged by some mainstream Israeli observers for getting entangled with U.S. President Barack Obama over the issue of the 1967 borders), the Israeli prime minister has repeatedly accepted the notion of a two-state solution to the Palestinian-Israel impasse based on "two states for two peoples." It is Abbas who has consistently and adamantly rejected the concept of Israel as the state of the Jewish people (while he accepts "Palestine" as the state of the Palestinian people).

The reason is clear. Abbas, like Yasser Arafat before him, insists that Palestinian refugees have the "right" of return to Israel. On this point, he's not prepared to yield, which is the reason he rejected former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert's offer of Palestinian statehood during the Annapolis talks in 2008, four short years ago. This is old, forgotten history now.

The real issue is not the question of how sincere Netanyahu is about returning to the negotiating table without preconditions (despite his offers, and Abbas' refusals). Rather, the issue is that Abbas is conceptually incapable of breaking through the barrier – long ago shattered by successive Israeli leaders – of acknowledging the legitimate political rights of both peoples. On this core rejectionism, Fatah leaders are ultimately no different from Hamas leaders, who also refuse to recognize Jewish sovereignty.

For this, among other reasons, Jeffrey Simpson should reconsider the meaning of "moderate" when he claims, as he did in his Feb. 4 Globe and Mail column, that Abbas represents "the most moderate leadership in Palestinian Authority history," and that Israel bears responsibility for the lack of movement in the peace process.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Israel's Meir Medical Centre gets $1-million plus gift

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

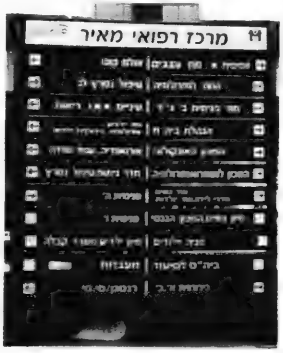
The Meir Medical Centre in Israel recently upgraded its cardiology unit thanks to a $1.18-million donation from an anonymous Canadian source.

The funds, which are expected to exceed all other donations in 2012 combined, will support cardiac treatment for the general hospital population, including an upgrading of a children's cardiology unit, said Arie Raif, president of the Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center.

The one-time donation was used to purchase advanced medical equipment that puts the Meir Center on par with the most up-to-date hospitals anywhere, Raif added.

"To us it's a major, major achievement. We have now ultra-modern cardiology equipment – the latest – and some was purchased from Israeli companies," he said.

Raif would not identify the philanthropist, saying only, "It's not your traditional philanthropist. It's a Jewish person not traditionally involved in the Jewish community."



The service directory at the entrance to the hospital.

The donor was attracted to the hospital's open door policy, under which patients of all backgrounds are treated. "What motivated him was the fact that the Meir Hospital has doctors who are Israelis and Arabs, nurses who are Israelis and Arabs and patients who are Israeli and Arabs," Raif said.

"He believes that the reconciliation process starts in a place like a hospital, because the philosophy of a hospital is that once you are a patient, everybody is equal."

Former Likud defence minister Moshe Arens, who has repeatedly emphasized coexistence and reconciliation between Jews and Arabs, also influenced the philanthropist. "He believes, like [President] Shimon Peres, that people build relationships and peace, not governments," Raif said.

Raif, who also serves as vice-chair of the Peres Center for Peace Foundation, said the Canadian Friends group receives donations in Canada from a wide variety of individuals, including Israeli Arabs.

The Meir Medical Center serves a population of around 800,000 in a densely packed area north of Tel Aviv, including residents of Ramat Hasharon, Kfar Saba, Herzliya, Raanana and Netanya. With 717 beds, the hospital offers a pediatric surgery ward, an intensive care unit and a spine institute. It is also known for cancer research, orthopedic surgery, geriatric care and head and neck surgery.

Raif said the Canadian Friends group, established about six years ago, has set a target of raising $5 million over the next three years to go toward completion of a dedicated children's wing.

Its next major event is scheduled for April 22, when the friends group will present its "Medal of Merit" to businessman Michael Dan and his wife, Amira, Mary Jo Haddad, president and CEO of the Hospital for Sick Children, and Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Advocate for your own care, Dr. Oz urges

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Cardiothoracic surgeon, best-selling author, and Emmy-award winning television host Dr. Mehmet Oz was in Toronto on Sunday giving his doctor's orders about how to live a healthier life.

Thousands of enthusiastic fans gathered to take in his lecture, titled "All about you: Revitalizing your life with Dr. Oz," which was delivered in support of the newly established MukiBaum Accessibility Foundation, the fundraising arm of the MukiBaum Treatment Centres.

Founded by Israeli-born Dr. Nehama Baum in 1979, the centres have helped hundreds of people who cope with a combination of developmental disabilities, and emotional and psychiatric disorders – such as autism, Down syndrome, schizophrenia and bipolar disorder – become contributing members of society.

"We are judged in society by how we treat the weakest among us," said Oz, who began his presentation by calling attention to the important work being done by the staff at the non-profit centres.

Having toured the facilities hours before taking to the stage at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts, Oz said, "I understand first hand the unique things that Dr. Baum was able to accomplish... that so many of us thought would not be possible."

The Dr. Oz Show host, who became a household name in 2004 when he began making regular appearances on The Oprah Winfrey Show in his scrubs, has forged a successful second career motivating his millions of viewers to live healthier lives.

The author of six New York Times bestsellers including YOU: On a Diet, and Healing from the Heart, puts the onus on the individual to ensure they get the best medical care possible.

"You are the advocate for your best care," he said, adding that people need to be familiar with their medical history, do their homework to find the best doctor, and not be afraid to get a second opinion.

But he stressed that the best defence against health problems is preventing illnesses with healthy habits, which include a proper diet and exercise.

"The battles for health care... will be won in your houses, your kitchens, your bedrooms."

Baum, who welcomed Oz to the stage, shared her story about why she wanted to bring the influential doctor to Toronto and how she pulled it off.

"This is a man who is not just talking the talk, he is a man who is walking the walk," Baum said.

She explained that after catching one of his shows, she realized that his philosophy is similar to MukiBaum's mission.

"The message of 'you' puts the responsibility on us to take care of ourselves," said Baum, who strives to teach the people she serves to become more independent and healthier.

The self-proclaimed "dreamer" said she wrote a letter to Oz that detailed the ways her centres make nutrition and fitness a priority, and asked him to be involved in the fundraising event.

"I think he liked [the letter], because he's here today."

Women will lead us

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

This article is dedicated to the thousands of Chabad shluchot, rebbetzin emissaries who together with their husbands are changing the world and preparing us to welcome the Mashiach. This Shabbat, more than 2,000 shluchot will gather in New York City at the annual international shluchot convention.

In 1988, after the passing of his wife, the Rebbetzin Chayah Mushkah on the 22nd of Shvat, the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, stated that a new phase in the imminence of the coming of Mashiach had begun, pointing to the unique role of women in making the redemption a reality. For women – to a certain extent more than men – have the potential to transform the Redemption from the realm of theory and expectation into actual reality.

To understand the role of Jewish women in preparing the world for the Redemption, let's backtrack a bit. God created the world so that He would have a dwelling among mortals. A home is a place where one can be one's self. Outside of one's home, a person may feel inhibited or restricted. At home, by contrast, all inhibitions disappear. Similarly, God desired a place among mortals where He could manifest Himself without any restrictions or barriers.

The ultimate home is where there is total harmony in the efforts of husband and wife. The woman is more directly involved with creating the home atmosphere. It is in that vein that our rabbis interpreted the term Akeret habayit, homemaker, as Ikro shel bayit, the essence of the home.

The consummate perfection of the dwelling for God in this world is achieved not only through revelation and influence radiated from Above, but through man's labour in refining his environment and revealing its Godly nature. Mankind's role is thus a womanly role – i.e., creating an atmosphere within God's home, making sure that the physical setting is imbued with meaning, depth and purpose.

In Shir Hashirim – the Song of Songs, King Solomon describes the bonds of love that connect God to the Jewish people. Just as in any relationship, where both partners have to contribute, so, too, our relationship with God is interactive. Each positive step we take in coming closer to God brings Him closer to us. The perfection of this relationship brings about the final redemption.

The Rebbe stated that all the Divine services necessary for God to "feel at home" in this world have been accomplished and all that is left for us to do is to prepare ourselves to welcome Mashiach. Welcoming Mashiach means internalizing the message of the imminence of the Redemption on a personal level. Relate to it not as a hope for the future, but as a reality that permeates and manifests itself in our way of life. Women have the capability to transform faith into a concrete reality and down-to-earth behaviour. Our sages tell us the final redemption will have many similarities to the Exodus from Egypt. After the miracle of the splitting of the Red Sea, the prophet Miriam led the Jewish women in joyous song and dance with the tambourines they prepared while they were still in Egypt. The tambourines were the symbol of their unwavering concrete faith even during the most perilous moments.

Presently, while we experience moments of great confusion or instability, the women of valour of our generation inspire us all with their powerful faith and selfless dedication. It's this complete faith that will lead us to the time when we will all join together, singing the Shir Chadash, the new song of Redemption.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel and chaplain for the Quebec Ministère de la Sécurite.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Knowledge comes but wisdom lingers

What is wisdom? Where is it to be found? Who is wise? The answers, of course, are varied.

William James observed that the art of being wise is the art of knowing what to overlook. The Talmud states that a wise person is one who learns from everyone. Elbert Hubbard wrote, "A wise man is a damn fool for at least five minutes every day; wisdom consists in not exceeding that limit." Alfred Tennyson asserted that knowledge comes but wisdom lingers.

Psychologist Joan Erikson maintained that wisdom must come from life experience. It must be well digested. It's not what comes from reading great books. When it comes to understanding life, experiential learning is the only worthwhile kind. Everything else is hearsay.

Over the centuries, thoughtful minds have recognized the gap between formal education and wisdom. Five centuries ago, Montaigne made this distinction while ridiculing a student of Dionysius: "His Latin and Greek have made him more conceited and arrogant than when he left home. He should have brought back his soul full. He brings it back only swollen; he has only inflated it instead of enlarging it."

Robert Sternberg, a professor of psychology at Yale University for 40 years, developed a comprehensive theory of human intelligence.

He wrote, "When I looked at people like Ghandi and Martin Luther King Jr. and Mother Theresa and Nelson Mandela – take your own pick – and if you compare them to Stalin and Hitler and Mao, they probably didn't differ much in IQ. It seemed that what differentiated them was wisdom. What matters is not only how much knowledge but how you use that knowledge."

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

Sternberg is distressed that we are culturally conditioned to think of wisdom in Lincolnesque or Solomonic terms. "Actually," he writes, "it is hard to imagine a greater achievement on life's stage than to have been a wise parent."

Does wisdom increase with age? Most investigators fail to find any convincing evidence that wisdom increases much from the age of 20 to the age of 90. However, there is good news. Many older people can significantly rejuvenate their cognitive skills through practice.

In his book From Philosophy to Neuroscience, Stephen Hall wonders whether wisdom is really desirable. "Lets face it: Who in his or her right mind would want the burden of apparent wisdom? The role of sage in any age deserves hazardous-duty pay. They sentenced Socrates to death. Nobody would hire Confucius, and nobody could protect Martin Luther King Jr. They mocked Pericles and despised Churchill and assassinated Ghandi."

He is certain that if there actually were wise people in our midst today, they would be dissected, eviscerated, macerated and ridiculed on cable television and talk radio before we ever had a chance to figure out if they were truly wise.

Thinking about wisdom almost inevitably inspires us to think about ourselves and our relationships with the larger world. With diligence (and luck) it might even make us think how both can be made better.

Trampling on academic integrity

The role of a university in today's world is diverse and nuanced. However, embedded in the mission statements of most institutions of higher learning, as an overarching principle, is an allusion to the pursuit of excellence, a respect for scholarship, and the promotion of truth and intellectual curiosity.

Included in the goals of Princeton University is the development (in its undergraduates) of "such core values as honesty, integrity and fairness." Harvard College encourages its students "to rejoice in discovery and in critical thought," while Cornell University pledges to "foster initiative, integrity and excellence in an environment of collegiality, civility, and responsible stewardship." One of the University of Toronto's stated objectives is to imbue in its students "the ability to think clearly, judge objectively, and contribute constructively to society." McMaster University's vision is "to achieve international distinction for creativity, innovation and excellence."

It's fitting that the mission statements of the academy speak to motivations that are both ambitious and principled. To a greater or lesser extent, university faculty are guided by such expectations and, in so doing, they undertake to conduct themselves with a degree of academic integrity that is becoming of them, their students and the institutions they represent.

What's therefore so galling is when faculty, or more particularly university administrators (who are themselves adherents to their mission statements), are perceived to be compromising their values by allowing into our lecture halls interlopers who have no record of scholarship and who, through polemic, bigotry and mendacity, trample on the very essence of civility and rational enquiry that governs acceptable behaviour on our campuses.

My View

Lawrence Hart

A case in point is the recent visit to McMaster by Zafar Bangash, an imam from York Region. While well known as a brazen apologist for the Iranian regime, Bangash will also be remembered for his pernicious rant outside Queen's Park in August of last year, at a so-called "al-Quds Day" rally. His intimidating demeanour, his recourse to historical fabrication, and his offensive messages were again manifest throughout his McMaster speech. Embellishing his depiction of Zionists as "parasites" and "barbarians," as recorded during his Queen's Park outburst, he deliberately interposed a reference to Nazism while describing "Zionists as racists" when he responded to a question at his McMaster presentation. But even aside from such slurs, his visceral anti-Americanism, his denigration of Canadian policy and his implied wthreats of retribution against Jews if Iran were to be attacked crossed many a red line.

The specifics of his propagandist diatribe needs to be more carefully analyzed, but the more generic issue relates not so much to what he said but to why reputable universities, such as McMaster, feel obligated to provide him, and his ilk, with a forum to spread their toxic, anti-intellectual views in the first place.

Why is it that there is such a disconnect between the high level of academic discourse demanded of university faculty while speakers invited from outside are allowed to ignore any semblance of scholarly construct, without scrutiny or penalty, both to them and to the groups that bring them to campus? Until this flagrant double standard is properly addressed, the worthy ideals embodied in our university mission statements will continue to be tarnished.

Israel goes to the Oscars – Pt. 2

As Oscar night approaches, we continue our look at Israel's nominees for best foreign-language film over the years. This year's Footnote is Israel's 10th film to be nominated for this Oscar – more than Denmark (8), Netherlands (7), Canada (6), Greece (5) and dozens of other countries. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael15] On the other hand, Israel has yet to crack the winner's circle. Here are some of the films that tried.

Me'Ahorei Hasoragim (Beyond the Walls) (1984): From the film website Rotten Tomatoes: "The jailers of an overcrowded prison conspire to keep Israeli and Arab inmates at odds. When the prisoners come to the realization that their racist attitudes are self-destructive, they unite in a daring escape plan." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael16] This page at YouTube links to several lengthy excerpts in Hebrew only. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael18]

Beaufort (2007): Israel had to wait almost a quarter-century for its next foreign-language nomination. Director Joseph Cedar's Beaufort tells the story of an Israel Defence Forces unit stationed at a Crusader castle toward the end of Israel's 18-year occupation of southern Lebanon. The New York Times wrote, "Even if it does not entirely rise above cliché, Beaufort has an earnest, sober intelligence that makes it hard to shake. It suggests that, for those who fight, the futility of war is inseparable from its nobility." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael19]

Vals im Bashir (Waltz with Bashir) (2008): In this movie, writer and director Ari Folman grapples with his inability to remember much of what he lived through and the horrors he witnessed during the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon. From Roger Ebert's review: "Folman is an Israeli documentarian who has not worked in animation. Now he uses it as the best way to reconstruct memories, fantasies, hallucinations, possibilities, past and present. This film would be nearly impossible to make any other way." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael21] The trailer is available online (with English subtitles and narration). [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael27]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Ajami (2009): Co-directed by Scandar Copti, an Israeli-Arab Christian, and Yaron Shani, an Israeli Jew, the film is set in the Ajami neighbourhood of Jaffa, and tells several stories about people caught in a cycle of violence, drugs and revenge. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael22] You can watch the trailer on YouTube (Hebrew subtitles) [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael23] (And for the moment, the entire movie is also available on the same YouTube page in chapters. Hebrew and Arabic only.)

He'arat Shulayim (Footnote) (2011): Joseph Cedar returns to the Oscars this year. Footnote focuses on the rivalry between father-and-son talmudic scholars and what happens when the father is accidentally told he has been awarded a prestigious prize destined for his son. The Jerusalem Post called it "brilliant and audacious." [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael24] Official website: [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael25]

Footnote won the best screenplay award at the 2011 Cannes Film Festival. So maybe it will be 10th time lucky for Israel at the Oscars, although it does face stiff competition this year from Poland's In Darkness, Canada's Monsieur Lazhar, Belgium's Bullhead and Iran's favoured, A Separation. [http://bit.ly/oscarisrael26]

Congratulations to everyone who will be walking down the red carpet on Feb. 26.

Missionary desecrates a Torah scroll

Guest Voice

Rabbi Michael Skobac

When a YouTube video of a notorious missionary desecrating a Torah scroll surfaced on the Internet recently, it took only a few days for it to go viral and receive widespread media attention.

On Jan. 29, "Messianic Rabbi" Ralph Messer visited the New Birth Missionary Baptist Church near Atlanta and "coronated" Bishop Eddie Long by wrapping him in a Torah scroll, fitting him with a tallit and parading him around in an uplifted chair.

Messer claimed that the scroll used in this bizarre ceremony came from the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp. The credibility of this has been questioned, along with the credibility of virtually everything he said about Judaism during his offensive spectacle. This included referring to the Torah's cover as a "foreskin" and asserting that the Jewish kings were wrapped in Torah scrolls. Long himself is currently embroiled in scandal after being accused of sexual misconduct by five young men.

The entire Jewish community was justifiably outraged at this deplorable violation of the most sacred ritual object of Judaism being used as a prop in a Christian worship service. Numerous Christian leaders also expressed their disgust over the disrespect and insensitivity shown toward Jewish tradition. Long as well expressed regret and apologies for the incident.

For Messer, a non-Jew and leader of Simchat Torah Beit Midrash, a "Hebrew-Christian" congregation and school based in Colorado, this was not his first wrapping of a besieged church leader in a Torah scroll. In a video he released on the Internet after the controversy broke, Messer unapologetically offered a rambling hour-long explanation and justification for his Torah travesty.

But the most ironic reaction to the growing scandal came from the so-called "messianic Jewish" community. Numerous leaders and organizations were quick to try and distance themselves from Messer, claiming that he wasn't a legitimate rabbi and that he perverted and misrepresented Jewish symbols and Jewish tradition. As one messianic leader lamented, "Judaism is not a toy box for Christians to rifle through".

Of course, there is tremendous truth to the old adage that when you point your finger, you have three pointing back at yourself. When messianic Jews give their ascent to every single doctrine of evangelical Christianity, can they honestly claim that their leaders are legitimate rabbis? When the messianic movement routinely perverts and distorts Jewish traditions, as their insistence that the three matzot at the Passover seder symbolize Christianity's Trinity, how can they in all good conscience distinguish themselves from Messer? Methinks the missionaries doth protest too much!

David P. Gushee, a professor of Christian ethics at Mercer University, observed that "one problem with messianic Judaism, in which leaders attempt to fuse Jewish and Christian traditions and symbols, is that it can easily stray into profound insensitivity."

Yehudah Ilan, who converted to Judaism after a long involvement in the messianic movement, astutely observed that Messer's wrapping of a Christian in a Torah scroll is actually an act that most aptly embodies the very modus operandi of messianic Judaism – the wrapping of Christianity in the cloak of Torah.

Icons of Loss: The Art of Samuel Bak Comes to Toronto

Internationally Renowned Artist Made the Holocaust Subject of His Work

By Daniel Horowitz

Television has been referred to as a "vast wasteland". But for 86-year-old Torontonian and Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg, television recently served as a portal into the past.

The year was 2009. It was 5 a.m. when Gerda, a past chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, a member of United Jewish Appeal's Atarah Division and, in 1985, the founding chair of UJA Federation's Holocaust Education Centre - now the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre - unable to sleep, turned on the set to help pass the time from dark to light. It was then that she began flipping from channel to channel when, suddenly, she saw a face - a face that took her back more than 60 years.

It was the face of renowned artist Samuel Bak, now 78, a man who Gerda had first met during her time in a Displaced Persons Camp in the German town of Landsberg from 1945 to 1949.

She still remembered Samuel as the fresh-faced young boy of 12 or 13 who accompanied his mother on her regular visits to Gerda – the camp's consummate seamstress - who made many of her clothes.

With every visit to Gerda, Samuel's mom expressed how she yearned for him to be able to showcase his remarkable gift as a painter. She worried that he might never have the opportunity to fully tap into his talents as the times were uncertain, to say the least.

"She was always talking about her son," remembers Gerda. "She would tell me how talented he was and how she was determined to get Samuel into an art school in Munich. Nothing was more important; she just knew he would become a great artist given the opportunity. I often wondered over the years what ever happened to her son."

Now, thanks to the show on WGBH Public Television early that morning, which highlighted Samuel Bak and many of his paintings depicting the Holocaust, Gerda's questions were finally answered.

But it was one painting in particular that caught Gerda's attention. One of the last paintings shown was, as Samuel explained to the host, from that same Landsberg DP Camp where Gerda first met little Samuel.

Samuel Bak

"This is when I first realized that the artist on this television show could be the son of my old customer," recalls Gerda. "That prompted me to wait for the credits to roll where I found the artist's name and the gallery that represented him."

For more than 40 years, many of Bak's works have been on display at the prestigious Pucker Gallery in Boston, Massachusetts.

"Would you by any chance be the young boy I met in Landsberg?" Gerda wrote in a letter to Samuel after seeing the show. "If so, then your mother's dream came true: she must have been so proud of you, as any mother would be. I would very much like to hear from you…."

That summer, soon after sending the letter, Gerda was on a plane to Boston to connect with the successful artist.

"I had always thought about Samuel, and wanted to reconnect with him after all these years," says Gerda. "But, until that television show, I couldn't remember his last name. Every time I saw a painting depicting the Holocaust, I thought it might be his. I was never sure, but always curious. Now, I finally knew for sure." Gerda, so impressed with her friend's work, began campaigning to have Bak's exhibit brought to Toronto. And, thanks to Gerda's energy and tenacity, she has turned her dream into a reality. From March 1 to April 30th, 2012, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto presents "Icons of Loss: The Art of Samuel Bak" at The Columbus Centre's Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery (901 Lawrence Avenue, West.)

This is the first major exhibition of Bak's work in Canada.

The unique exhibit consists of several dozen important paintings with roughly half of them based upon the May 16, 1943 photograph depicting a little boy at gun point during the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto. The other half of the works explore a different icon – Albrecht Durer's 1514 engraving Melancholia I. Bak wishes the viewer to dwell on the little boy and the Angel – representing all children and all angels – who, according to Bak, are "our brothers and sisters who have died at the hands of oppressors."

Gerda, for her part, wishes the viewer to think about "One Child." In this case, the life of Samuel Bak, that special child she met in the camp. He lived and went on to create a monumental body of work, both artistic and historic in its dimension.

"Imagine, she reflects, "if more than 1.5 million children had not been murdered in the Holocaust. Think of what they could have accomplished for our common humanity."

For more information about "Icons of Loss: The Art of Samuel Bak" contact Shai Abraham at sabraham@ujafed.org or 416.635.2883 ext.5153. Admission to the exhibit is free.

Legacy of Life: Marilyn Green z"l

By Monique Gottlieb

It was Marilyn Green's z"l lifelong dream to empower Israeli women through education. While Marilyn did not live to see her dream fulfilled, her legacy will live on and help future generations through her fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

For as long as she could remember, Marylin had wanted to spend time in Israel. As a burgeoning young writer, with a small contract from a Canadian Jewish newspaper in hand, she flew to the land of her ancestors, settling in Jerusalem for several months.

Through numerous helpful contacts, she met many devoted individuals who lived useful lives, contributing to the well-being of all Israelis, no matter what their religion or background. In particular, she was attracted to those involved in education, whether in the universities or at grassroots level. "Education, it appeared to me, was the key to lifting people out of their ordinary, often difficult lives, giving them more independence and feelings of self-worth," expressed Marylin. While visiting a small college for international students in Haifa, she learned of new and original opportunities for working with youth, and, later, she accompanied a female Druse community leader from village to village, where she provided basic social assistance to families. From these experiences Marylin became aware that women were responsible for much of the innovative and experimental educational activities in modern-day Israel.

Through these experiences, Marilyn resolved to leave a legacy through the Jewish Foundation that would merge two of her most passionate concerns: the advancement of women, and the well-being of Israel.

As an educated young woman in a time when women's education was less than fashionable, Marylin firmly believed that women were capable of great achievement, but were still not afforded the same range of opportunities as men. She left her legacy to help Israeli women achieve greatness by providing them with higher education through her scholarships. Her dream was for these women to emerge as the future leaders of Israel and contribute to positive change in the region. "I hope that my legacy may, in due course, affect not only Israel, but also the Middle East and the world as a whole," expressed Marilyn.

Marilyn Green z"l

Marilyn Green's legacy highlights the confidence donors and their professional advisors place in the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto as knowledgeable, responsible stewards of charitable assets. Through her legacy, Marilyn's generous spirit will endure and help future women follow in her footsteps.

Pioneer music therapist honoured

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Fran Herman, a pioneer music therapist for children with special needs, will be honoured by the Canadian Music Therapy Trust Fund (CMTTF) next month.

The reception for Herman, who's known worldwide for her innovative work, takes place on March 2 at Arta Gallery in Toronto's Distillery District.

The CMTTF was created to support research and to promote the use of music therapy in schools, hospitals and other facilities in Canada. A non-profit, it has raised more than $4 million dollars. The fund offers financial assistance to students, and over the past 12 years, it has funded more than 375 projects.

Until recently, Herman served as the fund's chairperson, and a scholarship is to be established in her name.

One of the projects of the CMTTF is the Music Therapy Centre, a street-front clinic on Bloor Street West in Toronto, which was founded by Herman in 2001. It offers a broad range of programs that are delivered by accredited healthcare professionals.

For more than half a century, Herman, 84, has been in the forefront of integrating all forms of expressive arts into music therapy. She has dedicated her life and her talents to making music therapy available to children regardless of their physical or emotional challenges.

"I believe that all the expressive arts can enhance what you do with music," Herman says. "If artistic pursuits are of fundamental importance to all persons, they are critical for those with special needs."

She has changed the lives of thousands of people throughout Canada and beyond, working in rehab with children who have cerebral palsy, muscular dystrophy, post- polio injuries, asthma, cystic fibrosis and other illnesses and conditions.

Born and raised in Cobalt, a small northern Ontario mining town, she met Carl Herman in Toronto and they married in 1962. An ardent advocate and supporter of her work, he died in September 2007.

Music therapy has received widespread recognition. It was used to restore the use of language by U.S. Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords, who was shot in the head by a deranged gunman and lost her ability to speak.

Universities and medical centres throughout the world are becoming more aware of the rehabilitative powers of music as treatment for many diseases and conditions, says Herman.

In 1955, she became involved with music therapy for children with physical and emotional disabilities when a doctor whose son had died of muscular dystrophy contacted her.

He had heard of Herman's work in music therapy and asked her to try to work with children with muscular dystrophy, as many of these children are not able to participate in most activities.

She was hired to work with 42 children. She created a program involving music, art, poetry, writing, drama and wheelchair dancing, which later evolved into the Wheelchair Players, a group of children with disabilities who present musical shows.

Music therapist Fran Herman is the author of the books Accentuate the Positive and Creatability, both co-written with James C. Smith. [Cynthia Gasner photo]

Herman's books and films are used as teaching tools worldwide, and she has organized and participated in workshops in many countries. She lectures on the use of music therapy for those with a wide range of diseases and special needs.

"Music," says Herman, "is a tremendously powerful tool that we can use for change. The effect that music can have on those who are in need of its spiritual and magic can be staggering."

Herman has served as president of the Canadian Association of Music Therapy (CAMT), which is dedicated to fostering the use of music therapy in clinical education and community settings.

In 2009, she was recognized by the Music Industries Association of Canada with their inaugural MIAC Award for advocacy for music for children.

Amy Clements-Cortes, a senior music therapist at Baycrest and an assistant professor at the University of Windsor who has conducted studies on the use of music in palliative care and treating Alzheimer's, says that "Herman is a pioneer in the field of music therapy."

'Webinar' series aims to unite community

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A new online lecture series titled "Unity not Uniformity" was recently launched by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) to provide a forum for community members to hear disparate views on controversial matters such as Halachah and Israeli public policy.

The "webinar" program launched Feb. 1 with the first of a two-part dialogue on religious pluralism and the role of women in Israel in the aftermath of the events in Beit Shemesh earlier this year. Two speakers addressed this topic: Anat Hofman, executive director of the Israel Religious Action Center, and David Weinberg, CIJA's Israel bureau director.

Hofman gave a talk from the Reform perspective on Feb. 1, while Weinberg gave his rejoinder on Feb. 7 from an Orthodox viewpoint.

Shimon Fogel

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, said the series is still a work in progress, but the decision to make it an Internet-based, virtual forum was done to take advantage of existing and emerging technology, which is both cost-effective and has great outreach potential.

The series isn't meant to replace live presentations. "There is a role for those, and we'll have those as an element on our menu of educational initiatives" going forward, he said.

Fogel said the initial series was joined by nearly 300 participants online.

He added that CIJA's goal with this series is not about "trying to direct people to one perspective or another. [Rather,] it's to provide them with the kind of information that would allow for a clear consideration of the issues, so they can arrive at their own conclusions."

The next webinar will happen in March and will deal with the settlement issue, Fogel said. There will again be two speakers, one pro-settler and another who opposes settlement activity.

"Both fall within the Zionist continuum," he said, adding that speakers with anti-Zionist reputations or backgrounds will not be booked.

CIJA is trying to "be responsive" to what the community says it wants to hear or talk about, Fogel said.

He acknowledged that a common misconception about his organization has been that it lacks a domestic focus and spends most of its time focusing on issues in Israel.

"For example, one of the issues we're contemplating for an upcoming webinar will focus on the issue of poverty in the Canadian Jewish community," he said.

This is not a subject that the community typically talks about, Fogel said.

Poverty is a pressing problem within the community, he said. "Not only do we have an obligation to raise awareness of it, but [we must] find ways of addressing it."

CIJA said it welcomes feedback from webinar participants to help determine what format works best for the series.

"It's important for us to signal [to the community] that we don't have a parochial perspective," Fogel said.

In related news, Fogel noted that CIJA is deciding whether to apply for intervener status in an upcoming end-of-life case that could come before the Supreme Court of Canada this year to present a Jewish perspective on the issue.

The case involves doctors at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre who want to disconnect a Muslim man, Hassan Rasouli, who is in a permanent vegetative state, from life support without his wife's consent.

Rasouli has been in a coma since 2010.

The issue, Fogel said, is whether religious considerations should play a role in determining whether a patient in such a condition should be removed from life support or "whether medical considerations trump all else."

CIJA is consulting with rabbinic authorities and looking at precedents to inform its decision.

Lviv resident on mission to save the past

Aims to preserve cemeteries, grave sites in Ukraine

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Meylakh Sheykhet is on a mission to preserve Jewish cemeteries and grave sites in Ukraine.

"We are obliged to do this," he said in an interview last week while on a visit to Toronto to raise awareness about his work. "We're one people, with one destiny, and if we don't do this we will not be forgiven."

For the past 25 years, Sheykhet, a 58-year-old resident of Lviv, has scoured Ukraine in an attempt to save its Jewish heritage from neglect and abandonment.

Thanks to financial assistance from foundations and private sources, he has preserved about 180 cemeteries and grave sites in Ukraine, whose registered Jewish population stands at around 120,000.

Yet he has only scratched the surface.

In his estimation, there are 2,000 Jewish cemeteries and from 5,000 to 6,000 grave sites in this vast country, which attained independence in 1991 and suffered through a Soviet and a Nazi occupation.

During the Nazi period, 600,000 to 750,000 Ukrainian Jews were murdered, either locally or in concentration camps, and some were buried in mass graves. Cemeteries were bulldozed and headstones were used as paving stones to build roads.

Under Communism, particularly after World War II, a number of Jewish cemeteries were razed and used for a range of different purposes.

Public and private buildings were constructed, and vegetable gardens and grazing land for cattle sprang up. In one bizarre case, a cemetery was flooded to make way for a fish farm.

"The Soviet system was not better than the Nazi system," claimed Sheykhet, a representative of the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union who lives close to the historic Golden Rows Synagogue in Lviv. "The Soviet system implemented a spiritual Holocaust."

Born in a small town near Zhitomir, Sheykhet, a telecommunications expert by training, was raised in a traditional Jewish household in Lviv when atheism was the state religion.

"You could be fired from your job if you were openly observant," said Sheykhet, who became visibly Orthodox in mind and body after the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.

Sheykhet's parents escaped to safety during the Holocaust, but 20 of their relatives were killed.

He was driven to action after stumbling upon the remnants of forgotten Jewish cemeteries in the Ukrainian countryside that had been violated by the Nazis and the Communists.

Meylakh Sheykhet

Working with teams of surveyors, scientists and historians, Sheykhet preserves cemeteries by erecting protective fences around them.

Whenever possible, he arranges for a monument to be erected on a site.

His work has taken him to such fabled towns as Tarnapol, Brody, Berdichev and Belz, where long-established Jewish communities once existed.

He has also travelled to lesser-known places such as Sosnivka, Mikulince, Tartakow Miasto, Lutsk, Olesko, Olyka, Turka, Stratin, Yampol and Sambor.

Last year, in Lviv, he found 200 mass graves.

Outside Ukraine, he has been involved in projects in Belarus.

Sheykhet works with a group of 20 experts and an annual budget of about $60,000, which he described as "a drop in the ocean."

In an ideal world, he observed, he would have access to much greater funds to hire many more experts to work in every one of Ukraine's 25 regions.

He doesn't receive funding from the Ukrainian government. "They haven't given us a penny," he said.

The central government, however, has passed decrees designating Jewish cemeteries and Nazi killing sites as protected areas.

The problem is that regional authorities don't enforce these decrees.

"The official bureaucracy opposes us, acting against government edicts," he noted, suggesting that land grabs take place when individuals seize cemeteries or decrepit synagogues falling apart.

Ukrainian organizations in Canada and the United States have responded sympathetically to Sheykhet.

"We have a good dialogue with them," he said. "They're supportive. But everything comes down to money."

In Canada, Sheykhet has forged relations with Mark Freiman, the last president of the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, and Janet Kerekes, a Toronto researcher who has visited Ukraine.

Speaking in a tone of regret and disappointment, he claimed that Jewish organizations in Canada have lost touch with their eastern European roots.

As he put it, "It's a shame to say they don't feel connected."

'A forceful advocate on behalf of the Jewish people'

Among the many distinctions and community honours that were bestowed upon him, he was made a companion of the Order of Canada, received the Order of Ontario and 19 honorary degrees from universities around the world, including the University of Toronto and York University.

Rabbi Plaut, a CJN columnist for 20 years until 2003, was the author of 26 books, including The Torah: A Modern Commentary, the standard text used today for prayer and study by the Reform movement.

His son said that Alzheimer's disease turned his father from a learned scholar and loving father to a man who was totally dependent.

"Asked why I would make the trip [so often] to visit him when he did not know us, [I replied] that the answer was simple. We knew him. We celebrate his life and legacy.

"He was gifted with the mind and talent to pursue scholarly work, and he was a person who had tremendous love and respect for humankind."

Everything had its place, though, he said. "[To my father], family came first. He was a wonderful problem solver, and he gave us his full attention, even if circumstances distracted him. When we left a discussion, we felt supported and knowledgeable that he was a caring person."

Members of the community praised Rabbi Plaut and acknowledged the significant contributions he made.

Rabbi John Moscowitz, Holy Blossom's senior rabbi, said that Rabbi Plaut preached responsibility to oneself and to others. "He lived what he spoke, his word was his deed. He had faith, but understood those who didn't. He reached across many divides."

Donald Carr, the president of The CJN, who sat on several community committees over the years with Rabbi Plaut, called him a tower of strength. "He was intellectual, and could also be down among the people. When he got sick, it was a tremendous loss to the community, a loss that has not been replaced."

David Koschiszky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said in a release, "Rabbi Plaut served as a forceful advocate on behalf of the Jewish people for decades. He held a particular, pre-eminent place in Canada's Jewish community, for which his leadership will be missed."

Bernie Farber, former chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, called him "a defender of human and civil rights at a time when many didn't even know its meaning. We stand on the shoulders of such men."

Federal Liberal Leader Bob Rae said, "Gunther Plaut was a friend to many, and a teacher and leader of great distinction. As the senior rabbi at [Holy Blossom] for many years, he was a source of inspiration and guidance to the Jewish community and the wider Canadian community. A brilliant scholar, he was an active adviser to provincial and federal governments on human rights, interfaith understanding, and social justice and international affairs."

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, said in a tribute to Rabbi Plaut posted on the URJ website that as a spokesman for Jewish values and tradition, Rabbi Plaut "was usually ahead of the pack. He said things that others did not want to hear, or were not ready to hear. He articulated unpopular beliefs, and he fought for those beliefs. But Gunther knew no other way. He spoke the truth as he [saw] it, with no apologies and no excuses, but always in a voice uplifted by faith and by hope for the ultimate redemption of the world."

Rabbi Plaut was predeceased by his wife of almost 65 years, Elizabeth. He is survived by his son Jonathan, daughter-in-law Carol, daughter Judith Plaut, grandchildren Daniel and Amy Plaut, Deborah and David Elias and two great-grandsons.

Clement warns of Iran's growing threat

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Iran "poses the most significant threat to global peace and security today," Federal Treasury Board president Tony Clement said in a closed-door meeting with Jewish community and other pro-Israel representatives in Montreal.

Tony Clement

"We continue… to work with the growing list of like-minded countries in a bid to limit Iran's ability to undermine [global security]," he told the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), according to a text released after the Feb. 3 meeting.

"And we are deeply disturbed by the information contained in the most recent International Atomic Energy Agency report on the state of Iran's nuclear program."

Clement said he is proud that Canada is "a leader in the global fight against antisemitism," noting that his maternal grandmother from Syria was Jewish.

Clement was born in Manchester, England (his father was a Greek Cypriot) and the family immigrated to Canada when he was four years old. Clement, who represents the Ontario riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, is Christian.

"Canada has lived up to the promise that encouraged my parents to decide to seek their lives here… That promise is embodied in the values that I learned at an early age – hard work, tenacity and a constant optimism that a great land like Canada always instills."

Clement boasted that Canada has weathered the global economic and financial crisis better that most other countries, noting that in October, Forbes magazine ranked Canada "the world's best place to do business."

"Indeed, more Canadians are now working than before the downturn. Almost 600,000 more Canadians are working today than when the recession ended, resulting in the strongest rate of employment growth during the recovery by far among G7 countries," he said.

Both Canada and Israel have made "tough choices and done the hard work" necessary to create strong, stable economies, he said.

Clement said the aim of the upcoming federal budget will be to reduce the deficit by decreasing government spending and "keeping taxes low" in an effort to achieve a balanced budget.

On another issue, Clement said the government will increasingly use Internet-based technology to communicate with Canadians and to make its operations more efficient, including through online "town hall" meetings.

He hosted the first government of Canada Twitter chat, where he invited live questions on making government more open.

The Open Government initiative was launched by the government last spring to increase the availability of government data to the private sector and non-governmental organizations and to encourage Canadians to express their opinions on government policies and priorities.

Ordinary Canadians are also supposed to have greater access to government information, as it is released.

"This initiative allows the government to be more connected to, and collaborate more with, Canadians than ever before in our history," he said.

In March, the government plans to publish its "open government action plan," which will be presented at the International Open Government Partnership conference in Brazil in April.

"In this important area for economic development and government transparency, Canada is on the same path as Israel," Clement said. "Israel, too, is promoting the policy of open government, and has joined the International Open Government Partnership."

CJPAC describes itself as a pro-Israel independent, grassroots organization that encourages young people especially to get involved in the political process through the party of their choice.

British Muslim Zionist pulls no punches

Equates Saudi Islam to Nazism

Myron Love
Prairies correspondent

WINNIPEG — Kasim Hafeez has seen the truth and, in an address to a largely Jewish audience at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on Feb. 6, he pulled no punches.

Wahhabism, the Saudi Arabian version of Islam, is little different than Nazism, Hafeez said.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas should be facing war crimes charges at the International Criminal Court at The Hague, he said.

Anti-Zionism is code for antisemitism, he said.

The Islamic concern for Jerusalem is purely political, he said. Until the creation of Israel, Jerusalem was unimportant to most Muslims.

And often, he noted, those who claim to be pro-Palestinian are just anti-Israel.

Hafeez, 29, a British-born Muslim of Pakistani origin, knows of what he speaks.

Until just a few years ago, he was part of that Jew-hating Muslim world. He was even ready to go to Pakistan to train as a terrorist.

His worldview began to change after stumbling across a copy of Alan Dershowitz's book, A Case for Israel. "I figured it was just Zionist propaganda," he said of the book. "I thought I would read it and be able to refute it all."

Instead, Hafeez found that Dershowitz's arguments challenged all of the myths about Israel and the Jews that he grew up with. And, he said, he couldn't find any Muslim sources who could refute Dershowitz's points.

He decided pursue this new line of research and read books by Sir Martin Gilbert and other pro-Israel authors. Then he decided he had to go to Israel to see this "apartheid, fascist" and "racist" country for himself.

Not surprisingly – considering where he was coming from ideologically – he was immediately detained after landing at Ben-Gurion Airport. "Although I was held back for eight hours, I was treated with respect," he recalled. "The guard kept apologizing and offering me coffee and pastries. I understood that he was just doing his job."

After leaving the airport, he found that people were friendly and helpful. He contrasted his reception in Israel with the religious pilgrimage that he and some members of his family had made to Mecca some years earlier.

"I had never faced such racism before," he said of his Saudi experience. "Because of our skin colour, we were purposely ignored. At checkpoints, our group was held up in the heat longer than others. My aunt was pushed away from an ATM machine by a Saudi woman who told her that Pakistanis can wait. And, if we had had Pakistani passports, our treatment would have been worse."

Kasim Hafeez

In Israel, Hafeez's epiphany came when he stood before the Western Wall. "I watched Christians, Muslims and Jews peacefully and freely going to their places of worship and I burst into tears. I finally realized what Israel is all about – the only Jewish state in the world. It is about the survival of the Jewish People, their religion, culture and heritage.

"I fell in love with the place."

It's far from easy being a Zionist Muslim in England. Hafeez said he's been marginalized by his community, and most of his family won't talk to him any more (his sister, an aunt and his mother being the exceptions – although, he added, his mother is embarrassed by him).

Nonetheless, he feels compelled to speak the truth and cut through the lies. That truth is that of the two narratives concerning Israel/Palestine, one is the truth and the other is a pack of lies, he said.

"It was the Arabs, not the Jews who rejected partition in 1948," he said. "It was the Arabs who attacked the new Jewish state. While I have sympathy for the Palestinian people, you can't take their expressions of peace seriously when they are constantly showing maps of the land of Israel as greater Palestine."

He urged his audience to get the facts about Israel out, especially on university campuses, to be proactive rather than reactive. "Hold regular events that promote Israel in the best possible way," he said. "And show people that Israel is much more than just the conflict. Show all the ways that Israel is helping humanity. Be proud of Israel, not apologetic."

JGH successfully removes pancreatic tumour robotically

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) has become the first hospital in Canada to perform robot-assisted surgery in a delicate operation to remove a pancreatic tumour.

The Whipple procedure, as it is known, was conducted by having the robot gain access to the tumour through a series of small punctures. This eliminated the need for large incisions in the abdominal wall.

"The advantage of the surgical robot is that it permits greater precision in performing the surgery, as well as improved functional and cosmetic results," said staff surgeon Dr. Tsafrir Vanounou.

Sarah Canzer's tumour was discovered following a routine ultrasound of her kidneys. She is in her 20s and was shocked by the diagnosis, but said she was glad when Vanounou proposed the less-invasive robotic procedure.

The da Vinci robot provided him with a three-dimensional perspective of the operating field through a special digital viewer.

The patient also has less pain afterward, and the recovery time is dramatically reduced, shortening the hospital stay.

Vanounou said the risk of complications is lower and external scars are minimized.

"Every effort is made at the JGH, not only to keep abreast of the most up-to-date surgical techniques, but to be at the forefront among hospitals in Quebec and Canada in developing new procedures to make essential surgery more available to a wider array of patients," said executive director Dr. Hartley Stern.

"In the beginning, I was completely unaware that this type of surgery was possible robotically," Canzer said. "But I knew I was in good hands at the JGH, and Dr. Vanounou and his team took care of me at every step of the process, from initial diagnosis, through treatment, and finally through my recovery."

Since Canzer's surgery, two other successful robot-assisted Whipple procedures have been successfully completed by Vanounou.

Creating an exceptional life

When I heard that Louise Hay and Cheryl Richardson were partnering to write a book, I was very excited. A longtime fan of Hay's book Heal Your Body, Heal Your Life, I knew that Hay was not only one of the founders of the self-help movement but also one of the originators of looking at the mind, body and spirit connection.

Through her healing techniques and positive philosophy, Hay has helped millions to create more of what they want in their lives. She was able to put some of these philosophies into practice when she was diagnosed with cancer, and instead of drugs, she turned to affirmations, visualizations and nutritional cleaning, and had a complete recovery from her illness.

When I heard that Hay was co-authoring a book with Richardson, also a bestselling author, I was intrigued. Richardson is the author of Take Time For Your Life and was a regular guest on The Oprah Show.

Hay and Richardson's book, You Can Create an Exceptional Life (what a fabulous title!), is a series of candid conversations between these two women. The book empowers you and gives you some tools to create the exceptional life you've always dreamed of.

There is a beautiful quote that summarizes how important it is to begin by thinking good and positive thoughts: "The formula is simple: think thoughts that make you feel good, make choices that make you feel good and take actions that make you feel good. Then surrender the outcome, trusting that Life will bring you what you need to grow and be happy."

Hay is a huge believer in affirmations and in journaling, so Richardson began keeping a journal every morning and finished her journal entry with a list of spontaneous affirmations.

At the back of You Can Create an Exceptional Life, there is a wonderful list of affirmations for every occasion. They really do work. Here are a few samples.

- "All is well. I have time for everything I need to do today."
- "My life is so blessed."
- "I am showered with good thoughts all day long." (Great one to say in the shower!)
- Throughout the day: "I love my life." "I love this day." "Life loves me." "I love it when the sun shines." "Changing my thoughts is easy and comfortable."
- "I work in creative collaboration with smart, inspiring people on projects that contribute to the healing of the world."
- "This job is deeply fulfilling, and it is a joy for me to go to work each day."

You can even try to write your own personal affirmation. This can be very powerful.

If you are having a difficult time with someone in your life or at work, you can use your mind to change the situation. Says Hay, "Try: 'I have a wonderful relationship with everyone at work, including.....' Every time that person comes into your mind, repeat the affirmation." She continues, "Whenever they come up in your mind, especially the ones you have trouble with, focus on what's right with them instead of what's wrong. You will be amazed by how the relationship improves."

How you start your day is how you live your day. So begin each day with a sunny, positive attitude, full of hope and love, and chances are your day will unfold in very much the same way.

יהורם גאון- איש ללא גבולות

יהורם גאון, חתן פרס ישראל, עשה כמעט הכל בקאריירה הארוכה שלו, כולל היותו זמר לאומי, כוכב מחזות זמר וסרטים, שדרן רדיו וחבר מועצת עיריית ירושלים. אבל ידעי דבר מדווחים לי שזו הפעם הראשונה שגאון מככב בדרמה קלאסית, והוא עושה זאת, מה להגיד לכם, בצורה מדהימה.

דמותו הדרמאטית והטראגית מכסה על כל האחרות, כולל גילה אלמגור, הגברת הזקנה, שעושה תפקיד די בינוני ובלתי משכנע.

מה לומר, הקהל יצא מגידרו ואנחנו הצטרפנו לזכרון קולקטיבי של האיש שאין גבול לכשרונו. אם יוצא לכם לבקר בארץ- שימו את יהורם גאון ו "ביקור הגברת הזקנה" ברשימת החובה שלכם.

הרפואה הישראלית וכסאות המושב לתינוקות

הישראלים מתלוננים באופן קבוע על רמת הרפואה שלהם. לעניות דעתי ואחרי עשרות שנות השוואה מקצועית, הרפואה הציבורית בישראל עולה על רוב ארצות העולם, כלל קנדה, ובגדול. הינה סיפור קטן בנושא זה:

במשפחתנו נולדו תאומים לאחד מדחני. נפגשנו עם הסבא והסבתא המאושרים, ובין כל הפרטים הרבים ששמענו, הם סיפרו לנו שעליהם להתייצב במחלקת היונקים ביום השחרור של התינוקות ולהציג לאחיות את כסאות המושב המיועדים לאוטו. בלי בדיקה זו- לא ישוחררו התינוקות. מה אגיד לכם-לבי גאה בגאווה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Journal seeks to make Jewish thought accessible

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Karin Nisenbaum, executive editor of the University of Toronto Journal of Jewish Thought, said she hopes the online publication will make complex scholarly topics more accessible to people who are interested in exploring some of life's most difficult questions.

"We don't want the journal to be one that only speaks to an academic audience. The idea is to show... how Jewish works and ideas can answer questions that arise in the course of reflecting on human life," said Nisenbaum, a philosophy PhD candidate at U of T who hails from Mexico.

"When we introduce the articles, we try in some way to connect it to questions that are relevant to our readers."

The journal, which was founded in 2009, is run entirely by graduate students.

Nisenbaum said that she proposed the idea of an online journal in 2008, when religion professor Hindy Najman, the former director of the Centre for Jewish Studies, asked students for "ideas about how to reinvigorate the activities of the centre... She was very supportive of the idea."

The journal is funded by the Tikvah Fund, an organization that offers grants to promote Jewish scholarship, and it's supported by the Centre of Jewish Studies.

The editorial board is made up of Jewish studies faculty such as Najman, philosophy professors Paul Franks and Robert Gibbs, and religion professor David Novak.

"Each year, the journal is structured around specific themes," Nisenbaum said.

"The first issue was about religion and reason, the second issue was on the concept and practice of repentance, and the third issue that we're working on now is on the notions of divine love in Jewish thought."

Karin Nisenbaum

The third issue, which Nisenbaum is currently working on with associate editors Jessica Radin and Alex Green, is set to come out in May.

Each issue, comprised of articles, book reviews, poems and a feature interview, covers a broad range of disciplinary fields, including philosophy, theology, history and literature.

Submissions come from scholars from all over North America, Europe and Israel.

Nisenbaum, who spoke to The CJN from Yale University, where she's working with her PhD supervisor Franks, said she's thrilled about the interview subject for the upcoming issue.

"This year, we're very excited because we're interviewing professor Warren Harvey, who is professor emeritus of Jewish thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem."

She added that late last month, Harvey, a leading expert on the subject, delivered the first annual Toronto Journal of Jewish Thought lecture, titled "Notions of divine and human love in Jewish thought."

"About 50 people showed up for the lecture, which is unheard of at U of T," she said.

Nisenbaum said she's also encouraged by the attention the journal's Twitter account is getting, as nearly 100 people are following its tweets.

"Every year I think more attention is being drawn to the journal."

The journal is currently only available online, but she said the goal is to produce a print edition for future issues.

University library globes removed

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — The University of Windsor has removed three globes from its Leddy Library after complaints that the State of Israel had been defaced on them.

Peter Zimmerman, the library's head of information services, said the university is "investigating" whether the globes can be repaired. The university's human rights office was also alerted.

Zimmerman called the defacement, which was reported in January, "disturbing" with its "obvious undertones."

Zimmerman said the word Israel had been scraped off the globes, but not the actual geographical state, as "the word [Israel] typically appears in the Mediterranean next to two of the actual countries."

Israeli diplomat's wife wounded in explosion

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The wife of an Israeli diplomat was wounded on Monday when a car bomb exploded outside of Israel's embassy in the Indian capital of New Delhi.

The woman, Tali Yehoshua-Koren, is the wife of the defence ministry's representative to India.

The incident came one day after the fourth anniversary marking the assasination of Hezbollah's deputy leader Imad Mughniyah, which the Islamist organization blames on Israel.

Also on Monday, a Georgian worker employed by the Israeli Embassy in Tbilisi alerted police after noticing a strange object attached to a car assigned to the Israeli envoy to the country.

Israeli embassies have been put on high alert around the time of the anniversary of Mughniyah's assassination in 2008, fearing Hezbollah retribution over the Damascus attack against the group's military leader, which they attribute to Israel.

According to a report by Real TV, Israeli Ambassador Yitzhak Gerber's driver, Roman Khachaturian, discovered a black plastic bag attached to the car's bottom. He then notified police, with local officers dismantling the bag and finding an explosive device made up of a hand grenade.

The charge was then neutralized, with the car transferred to closer examinations by Israeli security officials.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, on Monday, said that Iran is behind the car-bomb attack in New Delhi as well as the thwarted attack in Tbilisi, adding that Israel would continue to act against the international terror Iran produces.

"In the last few months we have witnessed several attempts to target Israeli citizens and Jews in a series of countries, such as Azerbaijan and Thailand. In all of these cases we were able to thwart these attacks in co-operation with local forces," Netanyahu said.

He added that "the Israeli government and its security services will continue, with local security, to act against the international terror which Iran produces."

Israel's Foreign Ministry has instructed all of its diplomats to stop using their vehicles until they are checked by security officials.

Avigdor Lieberman

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said that Israel would not tolerate an attack on its officials abroad, adding that Monday's incidents show Israel and its citizens face a daily threat of terror, both "physical and diplomatic."

In February 2011, Israeli embassies throughout the world received several suspected terror threats that coincided with the third anniversary of Mughniyah's death. The threat was believed to be directed at embassies in Africa, Southeast Asia and Caucasus

Israel's Counterterrorism Bureau cautioned the Israeli public at the time that because of the increased threat of terror attacks against Israelis abroad, travels to certain destinations should be avoided, including Egypt, Turkey, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Armenia, Côte d'Ivoire, Mauritania and Venezuela.

The bureau said that the initial warning from the head of security at the Transportation Ministry regarding increased security in European countries took place more than three weeks ago.

Hamas PM vows armed resistance against Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The only path in the Palestinian struggle against Israel is the path of armed resistance, Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said during a visit to Iran on Monday, adding that the "gun is our only response to Zionist regime."

Haniyeh's comments came following recent reports of a change in Hamas' declared strategy in the fight against Israel, with some of the group's officials indicating that Hamas was headed toward a path of non-violent resistance.

Speaking on the issue in an interview late last year, the Islamic group's leader, Khaled Meshal, said that Hamas would focus on popular protests to unify Palestinians.

While not completely renouncing the use of violence against Israel, Meshal told AP that popular protests have "the power of a tsunami," pointing to the recent waves of demonstrations across the Arab world.

"Now we have a common ground that we can work on... the popular resistance, which presents the power of people," he said.

In addition, a top Haniyeh adviser, Ahmed Youssef, told Egyptian media in December that Hamas had to "create popular resistance that draws the world to our struggle, and that doesn't give the Israelis the justification to hit us hard."

"The non-violent approach is part of a strategy for our present situation to draw world sympathy to our cause," the top aide said, adding that the possible change in strategy was also a result of Hamas' "vulnerable situation against the Israelis, who have a huge propaganda machine."

But according to the Iranian semi-official Fars news agency, on Monday Haniyeh said that "we have come to understand that we can obtain our goals only through fighting and armed resistance and no compromise should be made with the enemy."

The Hamas PM also referred to the possible effects a recently signed reconciliation deal with Fatah could have on its policies, adding that the path "of resistance continues and if we make any compromise, it is for resistance and obtaining Palestinians' rights.

"[The] presence of Zionist regime inside Palestine is the root of all regional problems, and this presence poses a threat not only to Palestine but also to the whole region," Haniyeh added.

Ismail Haniyeh

On Sunday, Iran's leaders urged Haniyeh to continue the Islamic militant group's resistance against Israel and promised support, state TV reported.

Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told Haniyeh that Iran would always stand by the Palestinian "resistance" against Israel and warned him against "compromisers." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, for his part, said it was Iran's "duty" to stand by the Palestinians.

The hardline remarks come as Iran watches with concern attempts by Hamas to move closer to wealthy Gulf Arab states. Widened support for Hamas in the Arab world may come with demands that the Islamist movements moderate and not embarrass its new patrons.

Israel and Iran consider each other arch-enemies. Israel has not ruled out a strike against Iran's nuclear program, which it says is aimed at developing weapons technology. Iran denies this and says the program is for peaceful purposes. Khamenei, who has final say on all state matters, was quoted as telling Haniyeh that people expect Palestinian resistance to continue.

"People do not expect anything except endurance from Palestine's resistance," Khamenei said. He added that the movement "should be watchful about influence of compromising elements... since the outbreak of sickness is gradual."

Khamenei said the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat lost his popularity because he distanced himself from resistance. "Resistance attracts people, and it is a big resource that should be protected," he said.

The Supreme Leader said Iran would always "stand by the people of Palestine and the resistance movement." Khamenei on Feb. 3 affirmed that Iran had provided support to Hamas – a well-known policy, but one that Iranian leaders rarely state explicitly.

Haniyeh, for his part, was quoted as saying that Iran was a "strategic reserve" for the Palestinians, and that Hamas would continue a strategy consisting of the "liberation of all the Palestinian lands, the pursuit of resistance and the rejection of peace talks."

Haniyeh also met Ahmadinejad on Sunday. The president was quoted as saying that support for Palestine was a task for all Muslims. "As its duty, the Iranian nation has stood next to the oppressed nation of Palestine."

Poland changes restitution process

Roman Frister

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WARSAW — The Polish government's decision to make the courts responsible for the restitution of Jewish communal property has sparked harsh criticism from Poland's Jewish community.

The change, Jewish community leaders say, will slow down and complicate the process of adjudicating the estimated 3,000 outstanding claims.

Piotr Kadlcik, president of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland, told the cabinet member responsible for restitution that the change is not acceptable to the country's Jewish institutions.

Since 1997, the restitution process has been governed by public committees in which the government worked together with the Jewish community to efficiently return nearly 2,000 assets that had been seized by either the Nazis or the Communists.

The Polish government is seeking to win the support of the country's Jewish community rather than push through legislation the community opposes, but Kadlcik said Jewish institutions would not willingly sign away their right to apply to the existing committees, as the government was hoping they would do.

Under the new procedure, all restitution claims would need to go through the courts, which, critics say, will require claimants to prove land ownership in property registries that were burned during World War II or to procure testimony from witnesses who are no longer living.

The Jewish community would also be required to put up a guarantee of three per cent of the value of the property being claimed – a sum that will be returned only if the claim is accepted.

Four non-Catholic churches also oppose the change in the restitution process, but observers expect the Polish House of Representatives to approve legislation handing restitution authority to the courts as early as March.

Netanyahu/Abbas talks break down

Barak Ravid

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has turned his back on peace, after the Fatah leader warned that negotiations cannot resume without an Israeli settlement freeze.

Abbas spoke Sunday before the foreign ministers of the Arab League in Cairo and harshly condemned Netanyahu. He effectively issued an ultimatum, saying that if Netanyahu would not agree to freeze all construction in the settlements and agree to negotiate based on 1967 borders, the Palestinian Authority will renew its unilateral efforts to obtain statehood in the United Nations.

Abbas said he will send a letter to Netanyahu with his demands for resuming negotiations. If the response is negative, Abbas said he will restart the campaign for UN recognition of a state of Palestine.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Abbas said Netanyahu did not present any serious proposal during the talks in Jordan, and blamed Netanyahu for failing to take any significant steps to build trust with the Palestinians. Netanyahu did offer to impose another settlement freeze, Abbas said, but one that only includes a freeze on new state tenders and not a halt of private construction in the settlements.

"Ninety per cent of the construction in the settlements is private," Abbas said. "To call that a settlement freeze is just false. Today, there is no place in the West Bank and east Jerusalem without settlements. I once told my advisers that one day, we will find a settlement at the heart of the Muqata [administrative offices] in Ramallah."

A senior Israeli source confirmed that Netanyahu offered to halt new tenders, but not construction that has already been approved.

Netanyahu issued a statement sharply criticizing Abbas' speech, accusing him of bonding with a terror group, and effectively embracing Iran.

"Abbas' speech showed he is turning his back on peace," Netanyahu said. "Instead of engaging in negotiations that would bring an end to the conflict, Abbas prefers to link to the terror organization Hamas – the same Hamas that embraces Iran."

A senior diplomatic source in Jerusalem added, "Israel agreed in recent weeks to be more flexible and offered Abbas a package of serious gestures, but he decided to reject them, to again pose preconditions and to work toward reconciliation with Hamas," he said.

"We wanted to begin a long-term diplomatic process, but every time we get to the moment of truth, Abbas flees. It's a pattern with him."

Is this my Israel? A cri de coeur

Special to The CJN

Opinion

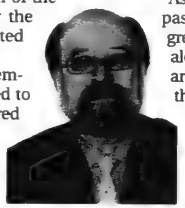
As an Israeli with great love for the Jewish homeland, it pains me to raise my voice in anger at the state of the nation. It would pain me more to stay silent in the face of recent developments there.

Something foul is afoot. Without ignoring the very real threats Israel faces from outside her borders, a danger no less pernicious lurks at home. The country's very democratic fabric is at stake. And I choose my words carefully.

Agreed, Israel is still a work in progress but it's too easy to leave it at that. Between certain legislative initiatives by the Netanyahu government, hostile actions by right-wing messianic extremists and anti-secular, anti-women, anti-Zionist conduct by haredi zealots, internal negative forces bedevil Israel.

I'm worried. After serving in the military, government, and in three wars, after losing friends and loved ones in battle, my conscience compels me to speak out.

With dubious objectives, the government put forward legislation to curtail the involvement of international NGOs in Israeli life; amend certain laws of defamation to prevent journalists from reporting on investigations against public figures and alter the nomination process to the Supreme Court that could effectively turn the court into a political apparatus. At the time, President Shimon Peres was highly vocal in his criticism of the weight of all of the proposed legislation. For the president to speak out on such matters reflected the overall importance of doing so.



Arie Raif

"These proposals deviate from the basis of democracy," says Peres. "A government is not elected to rule, but to serve. Every leader must be measured in one way – is he serving us or are we serving him? For a government or leader to 'rule' the nation is a sign of a dictatorship while 'serving' is a sign of democracy. The government was elected to serve the people, and if you serve the people, you serve everyone – both the majority and the minority, Jews and Arabs."

Equally disconcerting is the growing number and increased assertiveness of religious fanatics who try to subjugate women to a humiliating second-class status by forcing them to sit at the back of public buses, ordering them to walk on separate sides of the street, insulting and spitting on young girls they consider immodestly dressed, and, of course, to say nothing of the widespread haredi disdain for the state itself, despite receiving heavy subsidies from the state to sustain their separate lifestyle.

As if that wasn't enough cause for alarm, in recent months we've also witnessed multiple right-wing Jewish assaults on mosques and even – once unthinkable – an attack on Israeli soldiers at an Israel Defence Forces army base.

Such erosion in public morality and behaviour is deeply disturbing. I ask myself, both in sadness and in anger, where does this originate? I'm convinced much of what ails Israel stems from the chronically dysfunctional electoral system. It results in small, narrowly based, sectarian parties wielding disproportionate power with which they hold the larger, main parties to ransom when they cobble together a coalition government. Lamentably, the main parties have not resolved this problem.

Of course, the roots of this malaise predate the current administration. But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's foreign and domestic policies have aggravated the situation. He has helped create a climate in which right-wing Jewish nationalists feel sufficiently emboldened to victimize Palestinians and haredi radicals to flex their muscles in trying to impose their view of the world and of human life. While not advocating or even supporting these actions, Netanyahu has nevertheless failed to stand up firmly against the dark forces of intolerance and hatred that act out their agendas to the detriment of the country as a whole.

The coalition of the current government was forged – like most predecessor governments – with backroom dealings, concessions and compromise with small sectarian party partners, Zionist and non-Zionist, most of whom support Jewish settlements in the West Bank. As such, these parties have invariably been an obstacle to Israel reaching a peace agreement with the Palestinians. Although only a small per cent of Israelis are actively involved in the settlements, the settlement-supporting parties exert an inordinate amount of influence on the political system, in the process showing little respect for perspectives different from their own.

As a secular Zionist, I seek a state that encompasses a domestic and political framework far greater than that sought by the religious groups alone. Those who dream of a Greater Israel and are caught in their messianic dreams should read the words of awakening by none other than the "father of the settlements," former prime minister Ariel Sharon.

"Controlling 3.5 million Palestinians cannot go on forever," Sharon told a meeting of stunned Likud leaders, including Netanyahu, in May 2003. "You might not like the word but what is happening is occupation. It's bad for Israel and bad for the Palestinians and bad for the Israeli economy."

The only way of freeing Israel from the yoke of occupation is the two-state solution, for which Netanyahu has expressed support. But alas, it appears he may never have meant to implement it for fear of alienating his coalition partners. He clings to the mantra: there is no Palestinian partner for peace, while continuing settlement expansion and portraying Israel as being in danger of annihilation despite its formidable military prowess. Given such calculations, it's hard not to be cynical. His lack of leadership has robbed much of the country of the one quality so important for its future: hope.

Former Mossad chief Meir Dagan is leading a movement to reform the electoral system. He knows what we all know. Time is of the essence. Let's pray he succeeds. The future of Israel is at stake.

Arie Raif is an Israeli political activist and former Israeli diplomat.

Peres fetes Canadian

Canadian activist Judy Feld Carr was among the recipients of Israel's first President's Prize. The new initiative, spearheaded by Israeli President Shimon Peres, honours individuals who have made a significant contribution to Israeli society and the country's global image. Joining Feld Carr in receiving the award were former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra director Zubin Mehta; attorney Uri Slonim for his charitable and volunteer work, including representing the Israeli government in negotiations to release captive Israeli soldiers; Talmudic scholar Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, and the Rashi Foundation, which assists underprivileged youths. Feld Carr masterminded the rescue of thousands of Syria's Jews to freedom in the West and Israel.

New Supreme Court head

The Knesset's judicial selection committee approved Justice Asher Grunis as the new Supreme Court President Feb. 10.

FMs meet

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman reconfirmed his commitment to a two-state solution during a meeting last week with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton in Washington. After the meeting Lieberman "thanked [Clinton] for the determined stance of the United States on the Iran issue and said the steps taken in recent weeks send an important message to the entire region."

Family business leaves College Street after 74 years

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The outdoor mall in Downsview doesn't have quite the same haymishe character as the College Street neighbourhood that Exclusive Paints called home for 74 years.

Then again, how many mom and pop businesses can survive for that long, let alone thrive, and have the confidence to try a new location?

The Shiewitz family is still moving into its premises at Chesswood Drive and Sheppard Avenue, but it's business as usual as the familiar cast of characters continues serving customers. Behind the counter sits Esther Shiewitz, pretty much as she did back in the store's heyday in the 1970s, as revealed in vintage photos from the era. Joe Shiewitz, who's run the family business since 1978 but who started there in 1959, is pleased to share his knowledge of paints, mixes and tints.

There's son Aron, the third generation to work in the store, and you can't forget Habib Azulay, a sales consultant and paint specialist who has been with the firm since fleeing from Tangiers, Morocco, 47 years ago.

Daughter Cheryl, who works in real estate, acts as the family's media contact and informal family historian, relating tales from the days her zaide, Izzy Reingewertz, started the business in 1938.

Between them, they provide the kind of personalized attention you're not likely to find at a big-box store. And they know more about paint than those upstarts starting out with a small store and barely any inventory.

Still, in an era of Home Depot, Lowes, Rona and Canadian Tire, making a living selling what the big boys do is a challenge. Sales drop pretty much every year, by something like 10 to 15 per cent, Joe concedes. They've gone from $2 million a year to something like $600,000. When you have one outlet, it's hard to compete with the multiple locations other companies offer.

The key to retaining clientele and enticing new ones is personalized service and expertise, explained Joe Shiewitz. "I have personal relationships, and we know what we're doing," he explained.

Clients appreciate the company's ability to order specialized paints from boutique suppliers in New York, as he did for one designer client. And they are attracted to Exclusive's ability to match colours better than anyone else.

More than once, customers have come into the store asking for help matching a colour. Big-box outlets aren't nearly as accurate in rendering colours as we are, Joe stated. Some of the new computerized mixing machines are way off. Better to rely on the tried and true method he and Habib mastered years ago. Shiewitz said they could eyeball a colour in a piece of fabric, a cushion or some other object, and match it accurately, using equipment that preceded computerized machinery.

"I am old school," Shiewitz stated.

At the very least!

Shiewitz was born in eastern Europe in 1940 – not a good time or place to be a Jew. During the war, his family escaped the Nazis by fleeing to Siberia. Afterward, he landed in Toronto and went to work for Izzy at his first paint store on College.

"The paint store was always a Jewish hub in the community," Cheryl writes. "Often people would come by for a free cup of coffee, a shmooze and the potential to get some work.

"My grandfather helped people in any way he could, either it was helping them find work, lending them money or giving them product on credit."

One of them was Frank O'Dea, a down-on-his-luck individual who would work in the shop and who eventually turned his life around and founded the Second Cup coffee business.

Joe started working in the paint shop after it was well established. There he met his future wife, Izzy's daughter. They were married and Joe worked as a painting contractor. When his father-in-law took ill in 1979, he took over the business.

Like his father-in-law, he's a gregarious individual who relied on personal relationships to create business. But unlike his father-in-law, he wasn't willing to extend credit to people on a whim, or to load up on so much paint he had to scramble to find a warehouse to store it in. When he took over the shop, he was faced with boxes of bad cheques from contractors and customers, who had received paint and supplies from Izzy.

"They saw my father-in-law as a pushover. He got them a big job and they paid him with a fake cheque," Joe said.

Another change he implemented was moving the store to a larger location on College Street, going from an 18-foot frontage to 54 feet and more than 10,000 square feet.

The big accounts kept coming in and, of course, the store catered to local walk-in clientele as well.

It continued as a community hub "for many people to come and share stories, shmooze and, of course, buy paint," said Cheryl. "It is a family owned and operated business, all three of Joe and Esther's children have worked in the store, as well as their daughter-in-law. It is truly a family and community centre."

Their new store is continuing the tradition. On a recent visit there, all the Shiewitz kids were at the store, helping to arrange the shelves and unpack product. Esther was at her post, behind the counter, and Habib was ready to assist customers.

Oh, and there isn't a Home Depot for miles.

Store was Jewish hub in the community

Filmmaker looks at Sholem Aleichem and his world

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

When Joseph Dorman's friend – a professor of Yiddish and Jewish studies at Rutgers University – suggested that a film about the life and times of Sholem Aleichem (1859-1916) might appeal to an audience, he was only faintly interested.

"My reluctance stemmed from my ignorance," said Dorman, an American filmmaker who has worked for PBS, CNN, CBS and the Discovery Channel, and has twice been nominated for Emmy Awards for outstanding cultural and public affairs programming.

He added, "I had no idea how great a writer Sholem Aleichem was, and how much his own work explored issues of Jewish identity that were of deep interest to me. Once I began to read his stories, my doubts melted away. Indifference soon turned into obsession. The only doubts that remained were whether I could make a movie about a 19th century writer. That also became the challenge, and I like challenges."

Dorman, who describes his subject as "a brilliant and sharply observant writer," met the challenge with verve. His 93-minute documentary, Sholem Aleichem: Laughing in the Darkness, was screened at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival and is scheduled to open here at the Empire Walk 10 Cinemas (5095 Yonge St.) on Feb. 24.

Dorman's film is an engaging biopic about a highly creative and imaginative Russian Jew whose stories captured the authenticity of the shtetl, the world of our forefathers, and formed the basis of the beloved musical Fiddler on the Roof.

Through archival footage, vintage photographs and interviews with experts, Dorman, the scion of Jewish immigrants from Lithuania, Latvia and Ukraine, reveals Sholem Aleichem's genius in exploring a society on the cusp of profound change.

"Sholem Aleichem's popularity and influence were so great that his stories became synonymous with east European Jewry," said Dorman, whose previous film was about a group of young Jewish socialists in New York who develop very different political ideologies. "The descriptive power of his stories and their ability to capture the essence of an entire Jewish civilization made him the perfect vehicle to explore that world."

Joseph Dorman

Sholem Aleichem

Dorman admits he knew nothing about the figure he celebrates. "I had him pegged as a popular writer of sentimental fiction. I don't come from a family of Yiddishists, so I had no idea that Yiddish was transformed by Sholem Aleichem and many other writers into a remarkable literary language."

Calling him a writer of complexity and depth, Dorman said he excelled in the short-story genre.

"His greatest novels – Tevye the Dairyman, Menakhem Mendl and Motl the Cantor's Son – are really serialized stories often told in monologue form. Yet within the span of eight to 10 pages and through the words of a single individual, he could distill a large theme: the journey of an entire people from a traditional world to a modern one, with all its attendant dislocation and confusion.

"He witnessed the birth of modern Jewry, and he did it through word portraits of uneducated and barely literate people. Like Freud, a contemporary, he was a master psychologist."

Dorman contends that Sholem Aleichem churned out his stories during a moment of catastrophe, when the forces of modernity and industrialization uprooted millions of people and touched off a wave of pogroms in the Russian empire. "He wanted to use his art to comfort his fellow Jews," he observed. "But he didn't choose the path of escapism. Rather, his stories confronted these catastrophes head on and drew humour from them. If you can laugh at something, you've somehow tamed it."

Deeply respectful of Sholem Aleichem, Dorman believes that he, as well as contemporaries such as Mendele Moycher Sforim and Isaac Leib Peretz, essentially invented modern Yiddish literature.

As he put it, "The first secular Jewish novels were written in Hebrew, but there was a serious problem with this. Only a small minority of well-educated Jews could read and understand a Hebrew novel. But everyone spoke Yiddish. The result was that Sholem Aleichem's work had a huge popular following. He, in turn, provided east European Jewry with its first true portrait of itself through his stories."

Sholem Aleichem: Laughing in the Darkness enabled Dorman to reconnect with his past.

"I went to Ukraine to shoot footage, and simply travelling through the country in search of former shtetls and signs of Jewish existence was a powerful experience. In general, I think I now possess a more integrated understanding of my family's past and of east European Jewry's past. As a man who loves history, that has given me a great deal of satisfaction."

Dorman, who is working on a film about the history of Zionism, believes his documentary on Sholem Aleichem will be useful and enlightening to Jews in North America whose ancestors hail from eastern Europe.

"North American Jewry has largely been cut off from its immediate past. Most of us know our parents, grandparents or great-grandparents come from the shtetl, but we have little idea what this means. The shtetl is a place that is at once mythic and yet one-dimensional.

"The Holocaust wiped this world off the map, destroying this culture and our connection to it. We became focused on the destruction of a civilization at the expense of remembering what was destroyed."

Dorman hopes that Sholem Aleichem: Laughing in the Darkness will redress this equation.

TEATRON PRESENTS CAN I REALLY DATE A GUY WHO WEARS A YARMULKE?

Amy Holson-Schwartz's comedy Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke? was written by a "pretty committed Jewish atheist" who nonetheless feels "pretty sure I'm supposed to be with a Jewish guy," the New York-area playwright explained on her blog in 2010.

That's the contradiction at the heart of Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke?, the Canadian première production of which is being mounted by the Teatron Jewish Theatre Company of Toronto. PhD candidate Eleanor, fresh from a disastrous Birthright trip and a broken relationship, asks herself exactly that question when she meets Aaron, a Jewish doctor who is committed both to Judaism and Israel. Is reconciliation possible?

Directed by Ari Weisberg, with Jada Rifkin, Jesse Nerenberg, Adrianna Prosser, Scott Leaver, Reva Lawry and Ron Boyd. Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. $37 to $26; previews $19. Feb. 29 to March 11. www.teatrontheatre.com

Zero Hour* Is Here: Actor Jim Brochu won a New York Drama Desk Award for his uncanny impersonation of Zero Mostel in Zero Hour, which opened here last week for a month-long return engagement. Brochu's one-man show tells the essential "backstory" on Mostel's highly memorable performances in Fiddler on the Roof and other productions, as well as lesser-known episodes in his life. Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst St., to March 11. $59, $69.50. 1-855-HIT-SHOW, www.ZeroHourShow.com

In Darkness*: Agnieszka Holland's acclaimed film In Darkness, about a sewer worker and thief in Warsaw who helps hide Jews from Nazis, was an entry at last year's Toronto International Film Festival and opens commercially in Toronto this week. The veteran Polish director (Europa Europa, Washington Square) has made a gritty and compelling film that takes place largely in the darkness of the city's sewer system with the rats, stench and internecine bickering, noted the online magazine, Tablet. "At the end of the tunnel is a dazzling burst of daylight that is worth the wait," wrote reviewer Daphne Merkin.

Names in the News: Madonna will perform a concert at Ramat Gan Stadium near Tel Aviv on May 31, Ha'aretz reported last week. The concert launches her new world tour. Madonna has performed four previous shows in Israel, the last one in 2009, and all were sold out. The 53-year-old pop phenomenon, who has made no secret of her devotion to the Kabbalah, has also made numerous private visits to Israel with her children. Last week, she performed what NBC Sports asserted was the most-watched Super Bowl half-time show in history.

British film evokes London's Jewish East End

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

On the face of it, the outdoor markets, small shops and push carts of London's East End comprise the insular, working-class Jewish community in which British screenplay writer, playwright and novelist Wolf Mankowitz (1924-1998) was raised.

Mankowitz's most successful novel, A Kid for Two Farthings, published in 1953, was made into a film, directed by Carol Reed, in 1955.

The 96-minute movie, adapted for the screen by Mankowitz and set in the 1950s, is something of a fable. The Toronto Jewish Film Society will screen it on Feb. 19 at the JCC's Al Green Theatre at 4 p.m. and again at 7:30 p.m.

A Kid for Two Farthings turns on Joe (Jonathan Ashmore), a kind, impressionable, earnest boy who wants to help his struggling neighbours.

There is plenty of work around here for a Good Samaritan like him.

Avrom Kandinsky (David Kossoff), a Russian-Jewish presser-cum philosopher who rents a room above his shop to Joe's mother (Celia Johnson), needs a steam pressing machine, but can't afford one. Accustomed to having his hopes dashed, Avrom muses, "Life is all dreams."

Sam Heppner (Joe Robinson), an impoverished tailor with bulging muscles and pie-in-the-sky ambitions, aspires to be Mr. World in the bodybuilding fraternity. Sonia (Diana Dors), his blonde, busty, sensuous fiancé, is still waiting for an engagement ring.

Jonathan Ashmore stars in Carol Reed's A Kid for Two Farthings.

Joe's mother, a single mom whose husband vanished in Africa, is probably most urgently in need of help to rescue her from a life of drudgery.

After Avrom tells him that unicorns can grant wishes, Joe buys one from a vagrant. In fact, he has purchased a baby goat. But to Joe, the creature is a unicorn, a legendary woodland beast with a single horn that exists only in the realm of the imagination and folk tales.

With a "unicorn" at his beck and call, Joe the do-gooder sets forth on the path of righteousness. "Everybody here wants something," he says.

Thanks, perhaps, to the powers of his new pet, a local professional wrestling promoter (Lou Jacobi) arranges a match for Sam with a seasoned fighter (Danny Green) who has seen better days.

If Sam can win, he can go on to fight the fearsome Python Macklin (the hulking Primo Carnera, who was briefly the world heavyweight boxing champion in the early 1930s), and thus buy that elusive engagement ring for Sonia.

Joe is also instrumental in easing Avrom's life. Whether he can be of assistance to Joe's hard-pressed mother is another question.

Reed, probably best known for his 1949 film The Third Man, juggles these disparate scenes deftly, evoking a world in which Jewish immigrants and their British-born neighbours use all their wits to eke out a livelihood.

Mankowitz's lean, sometimes poignant script fleshes out their lives.

The lead actors, Kossoff and Ashmore, acquit themselves in respectable fashion. Johnson, who appeared in the iconic romantic drama Brief Encounter seems out of her element here. Dors – the British version of Marilyn Monroe – is little more than eye candy. Carnera is just there with his intimidating physical presence.

A Kid for Two Farthings is hardly a masterpiece, but its universal power-of-hope message stirs the heart.

Hollywood courts local thriller writer

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The buzz about David Rotenberg's new book, The Placebo Effect, has spread as far as California.

The Toronto-based writer says he recently went to Los Angeles because there was interest in turning The Placebo Effect (Simon & Schuster), the first book in The Junction Chronicles, into a television series.

He says he was "in conversation" with a producer of the Emmy Award-winning show Justified. But Rotenberg's containing his excitement, because "there no wedding yet," as he puts it, and he's been courted by Hollywood before.

David Rotenberg

Rotenberg, a master acting teacher and retired York University professor, is a prolific writer who also wrote the Zhong Fong detective series, which takes place in modern China. The five books were published in Toronto by McArthur and Company from 1996 to 2004, and his epic historical novel, Shanghai: The Ivory Compact (Viking Books, 2008), was a Canadian bestseller.

The Placebo Effect, the first book Rotenberg has set in Toronto, is an international thriller with much of the action taking place in the United States. New York landmarks figure prominently.

The story centres around Decker Roberts, a Jewish acting teacher with a special gift – he can determine if people are telling the truth.

While he has parlayed this gift into a lucrative sideline – he consults to big corporations for large fees – Decker keeps his identity a secret, sporadically making furtive trips to U.S. cities.

He's unaware that he's being tracked by a U.S. national security agency, as well as by an unscrupulous chief at the helm of a major pharmaceutical company.

Decker narrowly escapes death, when his home in the Junction area of Toronto is burned down. The fast-paced thriller continues as Decker tries to unravel why he's a target and who's trying to kill him.

So what gave Rotenberg the idea for this book?

He says publishing giant Simon & Schuster asked him to do a book that was not based in China.

One day, he was walking around his neighbourhood – he's lived in the Junction for 23 years – when he noticed there are more churches in the area than any other part of Toronto.

He checked into the area's history and discovered that when the Junction joined the city of Toronto at the turn of the century, some of the police records disappeared. "I thought, 'What awful thing happened here that some police records were lost?'"

He suggests that this amalgamation provided a convenient pretext for losing those records, because the police were probably "protecting some wealthy people who had done something wrong."

Rotenberg says he integrated these suspicions about the Junction with his interest in "synaesthetes," people who have special abilities due to a mixing of two or more functions in their brains. "They cross-reference sensory functions in their heads."

Decker, his protagonist, identifies with synaesthetes, because of his uncanny ability to detect the truth.

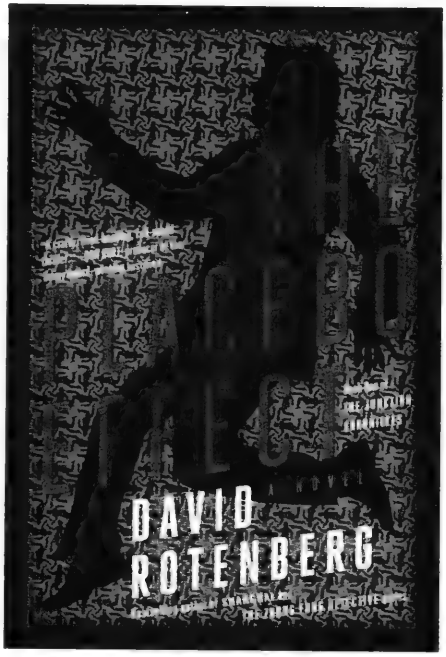
Many details of his personal life mirror those of Rotenberg's. For example, they are both acting teachers and both directed a couple of shows on Broadway.

I think you write about what you know," Rotenberg says. Decker also runs the Professional Actors Lab on Stafford Street in Toronto, which happens to be the exact name and location of Rotenberg's acting studio.

Known for his unique training style, Rotenberg has worked with a roster of well-known Canadian actors that includes Rachel McAdams, now a Hollywood star.

Rotenberg did a master's degree in fine arts, specializing in directing, at Yale University. He spent 14 years in the United States, directing shows in New York and working in regional theatres.

He also has an extensive academic career that includes a stint at Simon Fraser University and Tulane University in New Orleans.



But York University lured him back to Toronto with "an offer I could not turn down," he recalls.

He also wanted to live closer to his parents and three brothers, and he felt Toronto was a good place to raise children. His daughter Beth, 23, was born just months after he arrived in Toronto with his wife, Susan Santiago, and his son, Joey, who's now 26. "It was new house, new job, new child – all at once."

The move cost Rotenberg the bulk of his directing career, he says. But in 1994, he spent 17 weeks in Shanghai directing, in Mandarin, The Ecstasy of Rita Joe by George Ryga. "I directed the first Canadian play people ever produced in the People's Republic of China."

In Shanghai, he says he stumbled upon a situation that inspired the creation of the Zhong Fong series: he accompanied a stranger to the hospital and this experience became the kernel of his first novel.

Penguin later approached him about writing a historical fiction on Shanghai. "They said, 'If you like James Clavell, could you do for Shanghai what he did for Hong Kong?'"

He says he found a children's book with a line about Silas Hardoon, an Iraqi Jewish opium trader, who married his Chinese mistress. "That line was the genesis of Shanghai: The Ivory Compact."

Hardoon and his heirs figure prominently in this fictional saga, he says, noting that they were a powerful force from the 1880s to the 1940s.

Since 1995, Rotenberg has written a novel every 16 months. The second book in The Junction Chronicles is already completed.

"I'm really excited about the series. There's big-time interest," he says. "When I think of the series, I think of doing six or seven books.

"I'm 62. It may not be the last big project I do, but it's close to it."

Rotenberg will be reading from The Placebo Effect at Authors at Harbourfront Centre: Crime Showcase on March 21, 7:30 p.m.

'To get somebody like Mike is off the charts'

"It is tremendous for us to be led by a coaching legend," said Team Canada hockey chair Mark Goodman. "Mike has all of the attributes that we were looking for when we started this process, and the players will benefit greatly by having him around."

Voihanski, who also serves as director of hockey operations for International Scouting Services (ISS), learned of Keenan's availability through the Rangers. ISS has a relationship with the team, and Keenan is part of the MSG Network's broadcast crew for Rangers games.

Keenan was contacted and became interested in the Maccabiah Games position as he learned more about the event.

"To get somebody like Mike is off the charts," Voihanski said. Not only does it enhance the event's stature, but "it tells young guys it's a huge event."

Mike Keenan

Keenan said visiting Israel is something he has long intended to do. He was a close friend and colleague of Roger Neilson, who for years ran a summer hockey school at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla. "I was asked to go to Israel and participate in the camp with Roger Neilson, but I didn't have the time," Keenan said.

Both Neilson and Keenan coached the Peterborough Petes in the OHL at different times and worked together for the St. Louis Blues in the mid '90s. "We had a long-standing relationship and friendship, and we talked quite a bit about Israel," Keenan said.

Keenan said he has had ties to the Jewish community since the 1970s. He coached at Toronto's Forest Hill Collegiate for five years, and made contacts with members of the Jewish community. He remains friends with many. His first wife is Jewish, and his daughter was raised in the Jewish faith.

Keenan's former mother-in-law was a Holocaust survivor. He said he travelled to Poland in the 1970s and visited the Warsaw Ghetto and Auschwitz after hearing so many of his mother-in-law's stories about her wartime experiences.

Taking on the coaching position "is an opportunity to give back to a people I've been linked to for many years," he said.

Voihanski believes Keenan's presence will make it easier to recruit high-end talent. Keenan has lots of contacts in the NHL, and his recommendation about players could make the difference in some careers. "If I want to get noticed, being coached by a legend could open doors," Voihanski suggested.

Tryouts for the team will be held in Toronto, Montreal and probably Winnipeg, some time in June. The tryouts will be open to anyone, but it appears that successful candidates will have to be something more than good beer league players.

Voihanski has already compiled a list of 72 skaters playing in Europe, as well as in the AHL, ECHL, divisions 1 and 3 in the NCAA, and major junior and tier II junior players.

There's a wealth of hockey talent in the Jewish community, Voihanski said. "If I'm a player, young or old, I'd be chomping at the bit to become part of the team."

Some of the 72 who might expect invitations are the likes of the Henrich brothers, Michael and Adam, who are playing professionally in Italy; David Nemirovsky, who retired this year after a career in Moscow playing in the KHL; Jacob Micflikier, one of the leading scorers in the AHL with the Hershey Bears, and a couple of NHLers.

Voihanski believes it will be difficult to recruit NHL players because of insurance issues, but Trevor Smith (Tampa Bay) and Mike Cammalleri (Calgary) will likely be invited, he said.

In 1997 Canada sent a stacked team consisting of pro and major junior players. Coached by Stanley Cup winner Jacques Demers (who won in 1993 with the Montreal Canadiens), it defeated the United States in the gold-medal game.

Voihanski expects the Americans will once again ice a strong team of NCAA players. They'll be even stronger if several NHLers agree to play, among them Jeff Halpern (Washington), Mike Brown (Toronto) and Dylan Reese (New York Islanders). Mathieu Schneider, who's been retired for a couple of years, could be enticed to play for the Americans, he suggested.

Rounding out the tournament will be France, which should be able to put together a team with two good lines, as well as Israel.

Also on tap will be a masters tournament for players over 40 and a competition for kids 18 and under. Gary Kalk is in charge of the juniors, while Farrell Miller will put together the masters team, Goodman said.

Super Bowl bet pays off

JTA

NEW YORK — The Jewish owner of a real estate company in New York is donating his $50,000 (US) winnings from a Super Bowl bet to charity.

Jona Rechnitz, 29, of New York, had wagered $1,000 on Super Sunday at the MGM Grand Hotel in Las Vegas that the New York Giants would score first – on a safety.

With the odds at 50 to 1, Rechnitz earned a $50,000 payout.

Rechnitz, who is Orthodox, told TMZ, the celebrity news website, he would donate $5,000 to a charity chosen by New England Patriots' quarterback Tom Brady, who was penalized for intentional grounding in the end zone, causing the safety call. Rechnitz also will give $5,000 each to the charities of choice for four Giants' defensive linemen involved in the play. He also said he wants to take Brady out for a falafel dinner.

Rechnitz, owner of the year-old JSR Capital after having worked for Africa Israel, said he would donate the rest of his after-tax earnings to other charities.

The California native was visiting his parents and decided to watch the Super Bowl in Las Vegas. The Giants defeated the Patriots, 21-17.

E-marketer got his leadership skills at camp

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Robert Burko always remembers his days as a camp counsellor.

The successful young entrepreneur says the lessons he learned at Green Acres Day Camp in Markham, Ont., helped him grow his company out of his parents' basement to an award-winning business with staff around the world in less than 10 years.

"A lot of my communications skills, a lot of my leadership skills, I learned in that camp setting," he says. "If you can manage 30 children in a cabin, you can manage 30 adults in a job."

The Toronto native runs an e-mail marketing company called Elite Email. It helps clients create and target their mailing lists to maximize views.

"We can show you a map of the world and show you where people opened your e-mail," he says, adding that they can even narrow it down to the best times of days and days of the week to send out an e-mail.

Burko recently won the business-of-the-year award in the under-30 category at the Toronto Board of Trade Business Excellence Awards.

"It's great to be recognized in my own city," he says. "All that hard work and all those late nights and early mornings, it validates it in a sense."

Burko says he has always been drawn to technology, and although he was too young to take part in the Internet boom, he watched what succeeded and what failed and used that information to find his niche.

"I have the entrepreneurial spirit in my bones," he says, explaining his father, who started his own business, inspired him. "Ever since I was young, I knew I wanted to pave my own path instead of following someone else's path."

Burko describes himself as a leader and a motivator, explaining that he views his work ethic, drive and passion to succeed as contagious, and credits his parents' advice to always work hard.

Additionally, he says he remembers looking up to many successful people in the Jewish community and hearing that they began with very little, but studied hard and worked until they succeeded. Their stories inspired him to follow suit. As a self-described workaholic, he says he jumps between two modes: work or fun.

"There's no middle ground," he says.

It hasn't always been easy sailing for the company. Burko recounts spending months and even years building the company, and he remembers feeling that success was far out of his reach.

However, he pressed on, thanks to the positive attitudes of his family and friends, responding to their encouragement by pushing harder.

"They were so supportive around me that I was able to feed off that positivity," he says. "It was the quickest way to get me out of the rut."

He recalls the excitement of, for the first time, signing up a customer who wasn't a family member or friend.

Since then, he's served thousands more, located in more places than he can name on a map, he says. Additionally, he has hired staff in Canada, the United States, China, India and Finland.

He says it is due to the borderless nature of his business that he could expand internationally so successfully.

"All [our staff] needs is an Internet connection," he says. "When I hire for jobs, I can find the best talent possible. It doesn't matter where you're located."

Apart from his business, Burko co-founded Step by Step Africa, a charity aimed to fight HIV and AIDS in African countries. The organization focuses on women who have HIV or AIDS, and it aims to prevent the illness from being passed on to their children.

Burko says he's heard that about 10 children have been protected thanks to the program.

"I feel great about it and I'm so happy to help," he says. "We've changed lives."

He says he enjoys participating in the charity and watching those around him step up to the plate to help.

Despite all his success in business, he says his greatest achievement in life is his family. He married his wife, Michelle, three years ago, and they have been together for 13 years in total.

"[The company] could not have been here without her," he says, explaining that she doesn't work at Elite Email anymore, but was actively involved in every part of the business throughout its early stages.

As Burko reached each bit of success, he has aimed higher. He says that each time the company reaches a new milestone or wins another award, he takes a short break to celebrate before quickly moving onto the next target.

"We're at an all-time high, and I think in the future, things will get even bigger," he says, adding that he hopes to put Canada on the map as a leader in e-mail marketing.

For those young entrepreneurs looking to follow in Burko's footsteps, he says the best piece of advice he could give is to always be optimistic.

"You're going to run into problems," he says, "but as long as you stick with it, stay positive and work hard, good things will come."

'Thank you' is mandatory

Dear Ella,

About six months ago my grandson Adam had a bar mitzvah. It was small and took place on a long weekend. Invitations were sent out, and I knew some people wouldn't be attending, since they had already made other commitments for the holiday weekend.

Some of the invited were relatives, and knowing my relations, I knew they would still send a gift anyway. I told my son and daughter-in-law this, and asked that they make sure all the relatives who send a gift get thank you notes, not just the ones that attend. In all fairness, that's the right thing to do.

"Oh yes, of course," they both said. Well, here it is four months later, and I got a call from one of my relatives asking me if Adam received her gift. She went on to say, "I know the cheque was cashed, but I'm not sure if Adam knows it was from me, as I never received any acknowledgement."

What should I do? Should I call my son and find out why nothing was mailed? I feel terrible and am quite upset. I'm ready to let them know how I feel, but I'm afraid of what the outcome will be if I open my mouth. I hope you can offer your opinion.

Inconsiderate

Dear Inconsiderate,

It's unfortunate that you've been put in this position. You may feel this reflects badly on you and are concerned that people will think poorly of your family. As a grandmother, that's the last thing you want. The fact is, it's not your gift-giving relative that put you in this position, it's Adam and his parents who need to shoulder the blame. It's the job of the parents of the bar mitzvah boy to make sure this child understands and appreciates what it means to receive a gift.

Often in families there is so much happening with school and extra-curricular activities that there's not enough time in a day to fit in mundane tasks such as writing personalized thank-you notes. What a horrible lesson to teach a child.

Thank-you notes should arrive at the home of the gift giver no later than three months after the event. Ideally, they should be written within two weeks and sent out immediately while the event is still fresh. If possible, they should be hand written and personalized with the giver's name and type of gift. If it's cash, it can say "Your generous gift will help with my education, my trip, my Xbox, whatever." Just make it personal.

People have put their hard-earned, after-tax dollars into this gift, and it's mandatory that they're acknowledged in a timely and respectful manner.

Unfortunately, you're the one who's received the phone call, and it's up to you to relay the message. You don't need to preach. You just need to tell them exactly what was said. What they choose to do with that information is up to them. I might even ask Adam directly about the status of the thank-you cards, in front of his parents. If anyone argues or makes excuses, just say, "Don't shoot the messenger." Once the message is communicated, you've done your job.

PRALINE ROLO CUPS

1 roll refrigerated sugar cookie dough
1/2 c chocolate toffee pieces
1/2 c finely chopped pecans
30 Rolos

Preheat oven to 350°. Break up cookie dough and place in a large resealable plastic bag along with the toffee pieces and the pecans. Knead to combine. Measure scant tablespoons of the dough and roll into balls. Drop balls into a mini-muffin tin (no need to flatten.) Bake 12-15 min. or until golden brown. They'll puff up and look like they're going to overflow, but they'll sink in after removing from the heat. Remove from oven - immediately press a Rolo into each center. Cool one minute and push in edges of the cookie slightly. Carefully remove from pan!

The Agence France-Presse, an international news service, claims there are X-rays that substantiate the caption of a recent photograph allegedly depicting Israeli army brutality. Yet, after checking Palestinian, international and Israeli sources, it appears that the "injured worker," was, in fact, not actually injured. Moreover, there is no evidence that he was even run over.

The importance of narrative

Everyone loves stories. It is almost universal practice for parents to read stories to children at bedtime. Every family social event is full of stories. It's common for parents to tell stories about our childhood, often about incidents when, as children, we probably remember wishing we could remove ourselves from the conversation because something we found embarrassing was being said about us, or we found ourselves rolling our eyes as we heard the same story being retold. For those involved in the care of our elders, stories are often integral to the fabric of our relationship. It's not surprising that, in the world of the arts, a narrative plays a very important role as the basis of the presentation.

I recently experienced the power of narrative in our lives again when I attended a Chicago play with my sister, Diane, with whom I often share stories about our lives together and our parents, both of whom are now deceased. The play, The Last Act of Lilka Kadison, was one in which the Holocaust played an important role, but this in itself was not enough to make it compelling.

The protagonist, Lilka, was being looked after in her home by a personal caregiver, a common phenomenon familiar to many people with aging parents. My father had a very devoted caregiver, Mario, who lived with him for five years and became an integral part of his life up until his death, which profoundly affected Mario, as if he were part of our family.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

What made the narrative in Lilka's story so compelling was her recollections, during the days of her illness, to Menelik, a new male caregiver. She told him of a short-lived relationship and love affair she had just before her small Polish shtetl was overrun by the Nazis. Her family were killed, as was her lover eventually, but not before she became pregnant with his child. This son was, until the story is revealed in her narrative to Menelik, deemed to be the child of Lilka's late husband, who never knew the truth.

Lilka rejects the overture by her son, who lives out of town, to come to her during the illness that has required the caregiver, whom he arranged for. Menelik is able to unravel the story as he exposes his own narrative that intersects Lilka's and resonates with her.

The play has only four characters: Lilka as the old lady, Lilka as a young woman, Ben Ari Adler, the young lover, and Menelik. The flashbacks and many associations are the power of the narrative, and it resonated with the audience, who likely recognized that as we age, we often dwell more on our past. The future seems to hold less promise and the past often becomes more prominent.

This is very important for family members to recognize and cherish, especially in the face of illnesses such as dementia, which may make remembering new experiences more difficult, whereas the past always seems to remain, sometimes in ways that can be disconcerting to family members.

The repetition of stories can be difficult for family members. It is worst when the past contains horrific experiences that are relived, and it can be very disquieting and at times disabling to the individual. It requires fortitude, patience and skill for family members to balance the best of the narratives with the worst and show the forbearance that is often required for the person we love to have the best experience possible during this very trying period of life.

Then and now: trends change, traditions remain

Bar mitzvah celebrants in 1948 rejoice as they dance the horah.

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Just browse through a photo album of a bar mitzvah held in 1948 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Westmount and you'll realize that fashions and social trends may change, but traditions remain the same.

"I remember my cousin Lawrence's bar mitzvah," says Bella Wiseberg, now 83. "It was a double celebration because it closely followed the official declaration of the State of Israel. Everyone really enjoyed dancing the horah." Tsena Tsena, Bei Mir Bist Du Shein and Hava Nagila were popular tunes.

Today's seniors are often nostalgic for the post-World War II era. Leafing through photo albums, Wiseberg took time out to reminisce and make comparisons.

After marrying a man from the United States in 1954, Wiseberg settled in New York. But she never forgot all the fun she had growing up in Montreal, and still visits to attend family simchahs.

Religious customs haven't changed much, Wiseberg says. At her cousin's bar mitzvah, he was called up to the Torah on Saturday morning. Following services, the congregation attended a kiddush hosted by the family. After Shabbat, relatives and friends were invited back to the shul for dinner and dancing.

But not everything has stayed the same. "Maybe I'm old-fashioned," Wiseberg says, "but I miss some things."

Formal reception lines are no longer de rigueur, and Wiseberg admits many were happy to see them go. "Some people felt it was an imposition, having to line up and wait in turn to wish the hosts and celebrants a hearty mazel tov. Perhaps they thought everyone would have an opportunity to shmooze and wish mazel tov during the function, but it doesn't always work out that way."

Whenever she attends a reception today, whether in Montreal, Toronto or New York, Wiseberg invariably encounters another disconcerting social convention. "For sure, young people will poke fun at my age for this one." Usually, dinner and dancing coincide, she says. While dinner is served, the band plays and guests continuously leave the table for the dance floor.

"The music is so loud that I find it a strain to talk or follow a conversation, even though someone may be seated close by. It's especially frustrating for those of us who live out of town and want to catch up on things. Sure, there is e-mail today but it doesn't replace conversing in person."

As for styles, Wiseberg wishes she had kept some of her fashions. "I notice even hats are making a comeback."

Many women still wear hats to synagogue, but in the 1940s and early '50s, Wiseberg recalls, hats were in vogue for evening functions. So if a woman bought a dress or gown, she would often complement the ensemble with a hat. Gloves also made an important fashion statement. Depending on the outfit, women would also wear elbow or cuff-length gloves.

But as Tevye the Dairyman chanted in Fiddler on the Roof, "Tradition, Tradition!" Gloves and hats may change, but as Wiseberg has seen over the years, the traditions and warm family memories never will.

Summer jobs at Centre Camp bring couple together

Amanda Cohen
Special to The CJN

Most little girls spend time daydreaming of what their "perfect" husband would be like – tall, funny, handsome, mature ... While I can say I am lucky enough to have three of the four. I won't say which three. I never thought I would meet anybody as amazing as Jason.

After my first year of university, I needed a summer job and a friend's mom suggested the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre's Centre Camp. I applied for an office job and was interviewed by the then-camp administrator and my now future sister-in-law, Jen, who hired me. That summer, I quickly made friends with Jason – he's an easy person to love. He immediately made me laugh and put a smile on my face.

That summer, Jason broke his arm and begged me to help him put his contacts in. It was also that summer that he invited me to a movie along with a few staff members. When I went to the wrong theatre, he bought me a ticket and waited outside for me until I found it. After the movie, he walked me to my car in the underground parking lot to make sure I was safe.

The summer ended, a whole year passed, and then I came back to work at Centre Camp the next summer. Surprise, surprise, Jason did, too. He commented on my hair looking pretty, and when he found out I was single, he asked me out for a date that Friday. We went out, I spilled ice cream all over myself, and we have been dating ever since.

I am so lucky to have such a special and amazing relationship. As cliche as it sounds, I truly have found my very best friend. I knew after that first date that he was

Jason and Amanda

"the one." Actually, on our second date, I had such a good time, I thanked him and said, "Bye, I love you" by accident. I was so embarrassed, but Jason made me laugh about it and forgot it quickly.

So in August 2011 when Jason and I – still working at Centre Camp together – had to go to a weekly staff meeting, I didn't find it unusual for him to first ask me out for dinner.

He had been telling me for weeks that he'd found the perfect book for me, one I would love, and he'd pre-ordered it. I didn't find this strange. Jason knows I love to read, however, he had given me an e-reader for my birthday, but I didn't question his ordering the book. I also didn't question Jason's brother bringing 50 packages of cocktail hotdogs to his mom's house, saying they were for a friend's barbecue later that week. A l'chaim to celebrate our engagement was the last thing on my mind.

On the day of our staff meeting, Jason told me to come upstairs and sit on the couch and close my eyes. I did, and he handed me the book. As a good girlfriend would, I acted excited when I saw it, gave him a kiss and said thank you, all while not noticing he was on one knee. I opened the flap of the 900-page book and began to read the description in a British accent. Honestly, the book seemed terrible, but so as to not disappoint my boyfriend, I pretended I was excited to receive this book on British history.

Jason was sweating profusely, and I still did not know anything was out of the ordinary until I put the book down and started flipping through the pages. What I found were not the wise words of a British author but rather a hole cut out, and in the middle of the book was my engagement ring. I started to cry, my heart pounding with excitement, and screamed "yes!" Then Jason told me he videotaped the entire thing.

I am so excited for my life with Jason. His wonderful family has welcomed me with open arms, and I am so lucky and excited to have them. Jason and I are getting married in July 2013, and I now know that a chance encounter, ice cream spill, and premature declarations of love were all important milestones into what has become the greatest adventure of my life. I will gladly help him put in his contacts for the rest of my life.

Culinary tips save time, yield good results

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Before 1970, only 17 per cent of Canadian mothers with preschool children were in the workforce and the kitchen was a woman's domain. To reach female readers, magazine editors invariably included culinary tips addressed to brides in recipe columns and articles related to the home.

Today, more than two-thirds of mothers with preschoolers work outside the home. And men are also likely to be involved in shopping, meal and party preparations. Now both partners are bound to appreciate culinary tips that save time and yield good results.

For starters, check out these fruit- and vegetable-shopping tips. Cantaloupes should have a thick, close netting on the rind, which indicates best quality. Cantaloupes are ripe when the stem scar is smooth and the space between the netting is yellow-green. Honeydews are ripe when the rind has a creamy to yellowish colour and a velvety texture. Immature honeydews are whitish green. Ripe watermelons have some yellow colour on one side. Choose eating oranges that are heavy for their size. Smoother, thinner skins indicate more juice. Leafy carrot tops may mean fresh carrots, but the condition of the leaves on most root vegetables doesn't necessarily indicate freshness.

For recipes calling for peeled sweet potatoes, place them in a pot of cold water, bring it to a boil and then let it simmer for 30 minutes and the peel will come off easily.

When making a fruit salad, sprinkle apples, peaches and bananas with lemon juice. Otherwise, the fruit will tend to darken.

To avoid soggy salads, add dressing at the last minute.

To hard-boil eggs, place them in a pan with a pinch of salt and enough cold water to cover the eggs. Bring water to a boil and remove eggs from the heat after they have simmered for 20 to 30 minutes. Cover and let stand 20 minutes. Immediately rinse in cold water. When boiling eggs, some cooks prefer to add a teaspoon of vinegar to the water to prevent cracking. To keep yolks from crumbling when slicing hard-boiled eggs, wet the knife before each cut.

To separate the whites of an egg from the yolk, break the egg into a funnel. The white will seep through but the yolk will remain in the funnel. If a bit of egg yolk gets into the whites, touch the yolk with a damp cloth. The cloth will pick up the yolk quickly without mess.

Egg whites whip quicker and to a greater volume when brought to room temperature before beating.

After opening a container of ground coffee, make sure to cap it with a tight cover and store it in the freezer to retain flavour and freshness for subsequent brews.

If a drop of red wine spills on the tablecloth, dab the spot with some white wine and the stain will disappear.

When you're making soup, drop a leaf of lettuce into a pot of simmering soup to absorb the grease from the top.

To dilute a soup that's too salty or spicy, add a cut raw potato to the pot and discard the potato once it has boiled.

If a recipe calls for breadcrumbs and the pantry is bare but the breadbox is stocked with yesterday's challah, simply break up the bread and run it through a food processor. Place the processed pieces on a pan and bake for several minutes in a moderate oven.

To store unsweetened chocolate squares, keep wrapped in a cool pantry. If the wrapper becomes oily, that means the chocolate has deteriorated.

To soften hardened brown sugar, put a piece of fresh bread or a slice of apple or a few marshmallows in with the sugar. Then make sure to wrap the sugar in an air-tight plastic bag and keep it in the refrigerator or a cool place. Parchment paper placed on the surface of baking pans and grills saves a lot of messy cleanups.

Many delectable desserts can be prepared and assembled in springform pans. To avoid batter leaks, wrap the two-part springform pan in tinfoil. To ensure the dessert turns out intact, cool it completely before removing the outer ring of the springform pan. Chill the dessert until it is firm, then slide a metal spatula under the crust from several angles to loosen it and then place it on a serving dish.

Keeping a journal can deepen ties between mates

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Coordinator

The years fly by and married couples are so busy attending to domestic, social and career commitments that they rarely take time to reflect on their relationship, let alone document each other's commendable qualities. However, American author and educator Raphael Cushnir has paved the way for such an enriching exercise in Back to Us, a couples journal of reconnection and growth.

This extraordinary hardcover coil-bound journal is distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada. The book is divided into four indent-tabbed sections. The author of several books, Cushnir is a popular guest on television shows and he also addresses audiences and leads seminars throughout North America.

In Back to Us, Cushnir aims to deepen the ties between husbands and wives by reflecting on worthy qualities and shared experiences. Cushnir's road map is designed to rekindle the spark that may lie dormant. Couples are provided with a platform to document their feelings. The instructions are simple and succinct. The colourful journal is embellished with a thick pad. It includes a template that reads: Exercise: Chapter: Name and Date. Other pages are set up for photos, notes and remarks. The neat little kit is easy to store and you only need a pen to get started.

Part 1 begins on a positive note with "Here we are" and an appreciation section follows. One partner starts off writing something he/she likes about the other and the spouse follows suit. The topic could be "Your kindness" and the idea is to jot down five relevant points. Other entries in the first part of the journal are "the most fun," "the biggest surprise," and "the great mystery." With regard to the latter, the author alerts couples to things they may have never considered. For example: "What makes her laugh at the oddest things?" The goal is to discuss these responses together. Partners are bound to discover more about each other.

Some pages include fill-in the blanks and certain questions could be public knowledge, but others should be kept private between husband and wife. The topics are similar to what couples discuss before they marry and eager to discover everything they can about each other's likes, including pet peeves, character traits, skills, inadequacies, thoughts, impressions, prejudices and quirks.

People see each other in a different light depending on the situation in which they meet and interact. For example, a wife may not really know as much about her husband as she thinks. He may interrelate differently with colleagues at work than he does with family at home. Cushnir opens up this door with thoughts such as "If I only knew you" and she, in turn, poses the same question.

The journal also includes anecdotes that serve as an introduction to journaling. "Peas talks" is an example. The moral of the story is don't assume your spouse adores everything you wear or serve or how you act. A relationship should never be built on assumptions.

Part 2 of Back to Us deals with "How we got here." While some people like to dwell on the past, others prefer to forget it and move on. Regardless, the author helps couples find middle ground.

In Part 3, couples face the present by examining "How we're doing." On a pleasant note, they recall congenial days with each other. For instance, how they work, play and appreciate each other's values. With a list of 25 values, it helps to see how their value systems vary. Values run the gamut from freedom and beauty to integrity and serenity. In that same section, partners are asked to reveal their respective feelings about death.

Part 4 is titled "Better together." Once couples have reached this section, they are bound to have experienced a reconnection and better understanding of themselves. Here the entries deal with subjects such as comfort and discomfort zones, anger, fear, disappointment, stress and power struggles. In Part 4, the author suggests ways to address these issues. The journal ends with notes on negotiation.

Back to Us can serve as an ideal discovery channel. It also motivates a couple to take time to stop and think about their relationship.

If even a few couples appreciate each other more than before after doing the exercises in the book, the author will have accomplished a great service. Besides, it's a lot of fun to fill in the blanks and contribute to a personal journal.

My Jewish wedding in China

Dolly Biel
Special to The CJN

I was born in Tsingtao, the port city on the Yellow Sea, in the province of Shantung, China.

My grandfather, who was born in Russia, came to China during the building of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and prospered, supplying railroad ties for its construction. He consequently built the first hotel in Manchuria, completing it in 1905. This was a luxury hotel, offering all the amenities.

After its completion, he returned to Achensk, Russia, where he met his beautiful bride, and after courting her, he brought her to China, where he married her. She was my grandmother. My mother was one of her three daughters.

While I grew up in China, our family travelled extensively, then settled in the city of Tientsin (Tianlin), where I spent my formative years. That was where I went to school and met my future husband, Bob, when I was only 14 years old. After a courtship of four years, we finally got married.

On our wedding day, several man-pulled rickshaws came to take us to the synagogue. The one I mounted was padded with snow-white cotton. The fenders of the carriage gleamed and were embossed with highly polished brass inlaid dragons, whose scales shone like fire, and which had bright red bead eyes. The glass and brass carriage lanterns on each side of the fenders were also highly polished and gleamed, reflecting the light. The rickshaw-man was very proud of his new rickshaw and smiled widely when he saw me, as he was to have the honour of carrying the bride.

When we all arrived at the synagogue, I was ushered into a private room where my entourage was already waiting for me. There was my future mother-in-law, my mother, my Aunt Lucy, my cousin, a few of my very best girlfriends, and numerous female family members of my future husband.

I did not have to wait long. Soon, I was ushered into the main sanctuary of the synagogue, while Bob's uncle, the best man, escorted him, with a few men holding lighted candles down the steps that led to the main sanctuary.

My father and mother took me by both arms and led me slowly along the aisle to a chupah, right in front of the bimah. The chupah was decorated with garlands of green leaves and white flowers.

Dolly and Bob Biel on their wedding day

As I entered, I heard a hush from the people who sat on pews on either side of the aisle.

"She's gorgeous."

"She looks so tall and slim."

While I approached the chupah, Bob was led to it by his uncle.

Finally, when we stood side by side, the rabbi started the ceremony. He made us walk around the chupah seven times, slowly led by the best man.

One wedding band was placed on my finger and another on Bob's finger. After the nuptials, a glass was brought to Bob and placed under his foot to be smashed. Then, with my veil raised, my husband came up to me and kissed me at last.

Out of town guest impressed by politeness

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

While in Toronto recently my son and I stopped at a deli on our way to the airport to pick up some sandwiches for the flight home. We chose some freshly squeezed juices to go along with our snacks and then quickly realized that we couldn't take our beverages through security. Our server listened in and cancelled our order without thinking twice. As we paid our bill, she wished us a safe journey and we were on our way.

Several things that happened in this short encounter are noteworthy. First, our server didn't snarl when we quickly changed our order. Second, she was kind enough to wish us a safe journey. So many of us go about our busy days without giving a thought to others. We were all taught by our parents to remember to say please and thank you, to help an elderly neighbour in need and, of course, to give up our seat in a bus or train to a senior citizen or pregnant woman.

These little signs of societal politeness have become mostly lost in our busy world. I always try to wait with an open door, pass it on to the next person coming through rather than let the door slam in the person's face, but only seldomly does the person thank me or even feign some acknowledgement.

I realize that we do things for other people because we want to, and because if we can help, we should and thank yous are not required, but even a little smile would be nice. We need to take more time in our daily, nondescript interactions with people. I'm convinced that if we did, long, difficult days would seem shorter and lighter.

An advertising agency in Toronto decided to take matters into its own hands and recently began a media campaign aimed at making Canada a better place while making each of us feel better. People for Good is a coalition formed to promote the generosity of spirit among Canadians. People for Good believe everyday good deeds such as giving up your seat on the subway or buying a coffee for a co-worker will not only make you happier, but that it will also make for a better Canada. In Montreal, Toronto and other major Canadian cities, billboards, newspaper ads, subway banners and online ads carry the message of People for Good, citing examples of simple daily human kindness as we go about our daily routines.

Little signs of societal politeness have become mostly lost in our busy world

They seem to be picking up on the Jewish tradition of tikkun olam – as one of their most recent ads that appeared in the Gazette stated, the campaign aims "to help make the world a better place, one good deed at a time."

Their messages list simple acts of kindness that anyone can perform with ease.

The campaign was launched June 29 across Canada. It was co-founded by Mark Sherman, executive chair of Media Experts, a media strategy and negotiation company with offices in many major Canadian cities, along with Zak Mroueh, president and creative director of Zulu Alpha Kilo, a Toronto-based advertising agency specializing in rebranding. Their goal was to use their expertise and harness the power of creativity and the media for the collective good.

Mroueh states: "Advertising is often seen as an intrusion, asking us to buy something or buy into something. The People for Good campaign is certainly intrusive, too, but we intrude with a different kind of message. Simply put, that message is be aware of those around you, be nice to them."

Some of the suggested ways to be good and generous are as simple as taking the time to say hello to a neighbour and sharing an umbrella with a stranger when it's raining. Canadians are invited to add suggestions on the People for Good website. One recent suggestion was to remember to call your mother.

Mah-jong game turns out a winning hand

Rebecca Unterman
Special to The CJN

It was an ordinary day last spring when I received a call from my grandmother. "Becca, I have someone I want you to meet," she told me excitedly.

Bubbie had been playing mah-jong with her friend, who suggested that they should introduce me to her great-nephew, Adam, who was really more like a surrogate grandson.

At first, I was a bit hesitant about the idea of a setup. I had been on a number of blind dates in the last few months and hadn't hit it off with anyone. I didn't expect Adam to be any different, but because my bubbie was so excited I agreed to give him a chance.

Adam and I first met at a Starbucks, and right away I knew this was not like any other first date I had been on. We had so much in common and the conversation flowed easily. We had grown up going to the same summer camps; he is a few years older than me so we never met, and we both have similar professions in the field of education. We joked that we probably should be rivals since he works for the Toronto District School Board and I work for the York Region District School Board. Even though he grew up in Kitchener, Ont., while I was in Thornhill, Ont., we still had very similar family values and visions for how we wanted to live our lives.

After that first date, we both knew that we wanted to see where this relationship could go. We spent the next several months happily dating, and as our six-month anniversary approached, Adam told me he wanted to take me away for a weekend. He refused to tell me any details before we left, and when we arrived at the airport, he revealed that we would be going to Quebec City.

It was gorgeous weather that weekend, and we went for a romantic walk through the old city and to a delicious restaurant for dinner. I was having a wonderful time, but never expected that Adam had planned anything other than a weekend getaway. After dinner he told me he had a surprise for me. He told me to close my eyes, and when I opened them, he presented me with a beautiful necklace. He told me that was to celebrate the six months we had shared together.

I was thrilled with my gift, but Adam told me that he had another surprise planned. After a few minutes a horse and buggy walked up to us, and Adam told me we were going for a ride through the city. Thirty minutes into our ride Adam told me to get ready for one last surprise. I couldn't believe he still had something else planned. Once again, he told me to close my eyes. This time when I opened them, he was holding an engagement ring.

Without any hesitation, I accepted Adam's proposal. I had known from our first date that this relationship was important, so agreeing to marry him was a natural decision.

All of our family and friends are excited to celebrate our wedding with us in November, but no one is more thrilled than our two matchmakers. Those mah-jong tiles were lined up perfectly that day, and regardless of the results of that game, Adam and I were the real winners.

Make-ahead Shabbat meal

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special To CJN

Shabbat dinners are all about family – whether that is spouses, children, parents, siblings, friends and guests whom we treat and lovingly call family. At the end of the week it's a blessing to sit down with cherished ones eight times a month and share the Shabbat candles, the blessings for the children and wine and food in the company and conversation.

Such a joyful time especially when we are welcoming a new member into the family through marriage should not be stressful by a frantic rush to get in the guests in the door, in time and with what makes the main dish a glorious success properly. By preparing the sides and dishes ahead of time, the night of need never mind the work and be more relaxed and pleasurable.

The Coq Au Vin recipe must rest over the night. Shortly after an initial cooking the day before the meal and being reheated as directed in the recipe, the sauce will be tightening and ready to be topped off by mini sprigs

GARLICKY COQ AU VIN

This classic dish is a wonderful make-ahead. As the dish rests overnight the flavours meld and mellow. As an added bonus the fat from the chicken rises to the top, enabling the chef du jour to skim it off and reduce the calorie intake. Although not traditional, the inclusion of potatoes and carrots means you don't have to worry about a last minute side of vegetable dish. Choose a full-bodied red wine for optimal results.

- 3 chicken cut into serving pieces
- 2 tbsp. olive oil
- 2 leeks, white and light green parts only, thinly sliced
- 1 entire head garlic, separated into cloves, peeled and thinly sliced
- 1 1/2 cups pearl onions, peeled
- 2 tsp. dried thyme
- 1 1/2 tsp. salt
- 1 1/2 tsp. pepper
- 1 lb. small mushrooms, cleaned, trimmed and quartered
- 1/4 cup all purpose flour
- 1 1/2 tsp. dried mustard powder
- 1 bottle (75 mL) dry red wine
- 1 cup chicken stock
- 16 small new potatoes
- 4 large carrots, cut into large chunks

Preheat oven to 350°. Heat oil in large saucepan or Dutch oven set over medium high heat. In batches, brown chicken on all sides, removing to clean plate as browned. Reduce heat to medium low.

Add leeks, garlic, pearl onions and 2 tbsp. of water, stirring to scrape up any browned bits from bottom of pan. Cook, stirring often for 10 minutes. Stir in flour and dried mustard. Cook, stirring for 1 minute. Pour in wine and chicken stock. Bring to boil. Add chicken back to pot along with bay leaf and potatoes.

Cook, covered, in centre of preheated oven for 75 minutes. Cool to room temperature. Refrigerate overnight. Skim fat off top. Bring to room temperature for 30 minutes. Add carrots to pot.

Rewarm in centre of oven at 350 for 65 minutes or until carrots are tender and meat is falling off the bones. Remove and discard bay leaves. Makes 8 servings.

GREENS WITH PEAR AND POMEGRANATE SEEDS

Tart and refreshing, this green salad with its acidic tones serves as a terrific foil for the richness of the Coq Au Vin. The greens can be tossed with the pomegranate seeds the night before and refrigerated alongside the vinaigrette and pear slices. Be sure to choose ripe juicy pears.

3 pears, peeled, cored and sliced
3 tbsp. lemon juice
3 cups torn arugula
5 cups mixed spring greens
2/3 cup pomegranate seeds or dried sweetened cranberries

Vinaigrette
1 shallot, finely chopped
3 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1/4 tsp. salt and pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Place pear slices in non-metal bowl. Pour in lemon juice, tossing gently until pears are well coated. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 8 hours or for up to 24 hours. In bowl, toss together arugula and spring greens with pomegranate seeds. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for 8 hours or up to 24 hours. In separate bowl, stir together shallots, sherry vinegar, mustard, salt and pepper. Gradually, in thin stream, whisk in olive oil. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for up to 3 days.

Bring pears, greens and vinaigrette to room temperature for 30 minutes. Remove pears from lemon juice; pat dry. Scatter pear slices on top of salad. Pour vinaigrette over and toss gently. Makes 8 servings.

MANGO RASPBERRY SORBET

3/4 cup granulated sugar
4 large ripe mangoes, peeled
2 tbsp. orange juice
1 cup fresh raspberries
pinch salt

In saucepan, combine sugar and 1/2 cup water. Bring to a boil. Cook for 1 minute until all of sugar is dissolved. Set aside.

Cut mango flesh away from pit; place in bowl of food processor. Puree until smooth. Pour syrup and juice into food processor; pulse until smooth. Stir in salt.

If making in ice cream machine, freeze according to manufacturer's directions. Before placing in freezer, fold in raspberries. Or, transfer mixture to 13x9-in. baking pan. Freeze, stirring, every 20 minutes, until frozen. Freeze overnight. Before serving, defrost for 20 minutes. Cut into chunks; buzz in food processor until smooth. Fold in raspberries. Serve immediately. Makes 8 servings.

Jewish wedding celebrations in Stockholm

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

On an unseasonably warm April evening in Stockholm, we approached the walkway of the Royal Swedish Opera house, nestled along the scenic waterways of the city.

The unmistakable sounds of klezmer music could be heard, along with the refrain of Simen Tov and Mazel Tov. As if finding ourselves in a daydream, we looked up at the second floor of this historic building, and through the floor-to-ceiling windows, we could see revellers dancing around the bride and groom. Men sporting kippot alongside women dressed in elegant cocktail attire held hands, joining in one energetic horah after another. What was seemingly a mirage was actually a Jewish wedding in modern-day Stockholm.

While there were some Jews living in Sweden by the early 1700s, it was not until the latter part of the century that Jews were able to legally settle in Sweden without converting to Christianity. By the early 20th century, the population had reached 6,500, largely based on immigration from Russia and Poland.

Sweden is the birthplace of Raoul Wallenberg, who saved thousands of Jews during World War II using his diplomatic status.

Sweden has always played a large role in my consciousness, as my mother, an Auschwitz survivor, found refuge in Sweden after the war. She worked in a factory in Stockholm for three years, before she left for Montreal. She often spoke fondly of her years in Sweden and the friends she made there.

My recent trip to Sweden was as a tourist. My son and I explored this beautiful seaside city while my husband attended a work-related meeting. Of course, we visited the requisite museums and walking paths, but my goal was to find out as much as possible about the present-day Jewish community and to try to imagine the daily life my late mother led there.

The Great Synagogue in Stockholm
[Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photos]

Walking near the tourist port just east of Stockholm's downtown core, I found myself following a set of rusted railroad tracks, seemingly leading toward the business district. The tracks led to a large monument dedicated to Raoul Wallenberg. The backdrop to the monument is the Great Synagogue of Stockholm, the city's main synagogue.

The gates surrounding the synagogue opened as a middle-aged man, who turned out to be head of the shul's chevra kadisha, was backing out of the parking lot. He obliged my gesture to roll down his window and ended up spending nearly an hour with me, talking about his life as a Jew in Stockholm. I found out that he, too, was the child of survivors who had settled in Sweden after the war, and he regaled me with stories about his childhood there.

Thriving Jewish community

He spoke of growing up with no overt antisemitism.

Stockholm has a population of approximately 15,000 Jews. The country has a Jewish population of about 16,000 out of Sweden's overall population of nine million. Stockholm has three synagogues: two Orthodox and one Conservative, with smaller Swedish towns such as Gotebong and Malmo having at least one each. Jewish cemeteries are found in many communities across the country.

The man spoke with pride about Stockholm's thriving day school and the Jewish museum. From his car he handed me a copy of the community's bimonthly newsletter and also mentioned the weekly Jewish radio program.

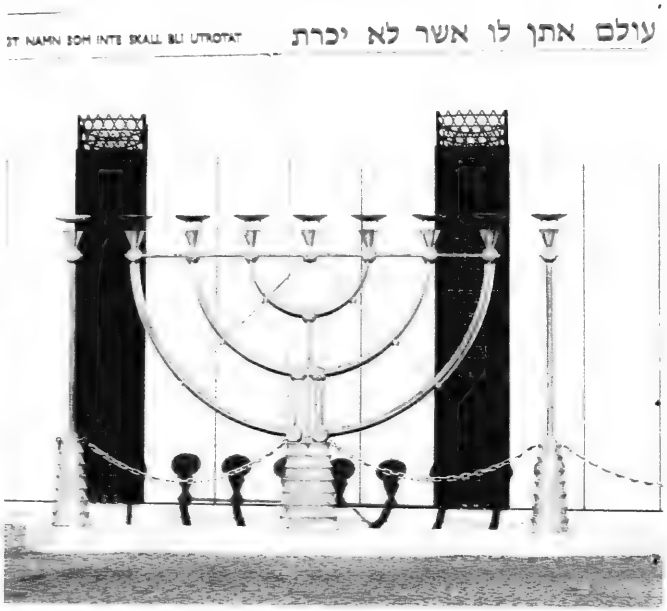
My son and I next went to the Jewish museum, where the curator, a Swedish Jew dating back several generations, gave us a few minutes of her time as she was awaiting a group of schoolchildren for a tour of the museum. She urged us to spend some time studying the museum's collection of Swedish and Scandinavian Judaica as well as the story of the history of Swedish Jews, which is brought to life through a cleverly done short film.

I was most anxious to study the photos of immigrants arriving by the boatload to Stockholm harbour after World War II. Although I didn't spot my mother, I could see the expressions of joy and thankfulness in the passengers' faces as they disembarked to begin their lives anew.

The museum also boasts many world-class short-term exhibits.

Guided tours of Jewish Stockholm are offered on several websites and can be booked in advance.

The Jewish museum in Stockholm is visited by tourists and local schoolchildren throughout the year.



The Holocaust Memorial Wall is adjacent to the main synagogue in Stockholm.

Greening your simchah

Shayla Gunter-Goldstein.
Special to The CJN

It's not easy being green, especially when it comes to planning a simchah. In this age of environmental awareness, however, families are committed to reducing, reusing and recycling. They are carrying forward this dedication to their planning of bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings.

More than just the three Rs, a green trend is emerging from the United States that is seeing families taking extra steps toward ensuring that their simchah has as little of an environmental impact as possible. E-vites over paper invitations, purchasing carbon offsets for out-of-town guests, buying local and seasonal flowers or renting reusable centrepieces, and using organic and local food are all ways that families are strengthening their commitment to being eco-conscious at their celebration.

While eco-consciousness is blazing into wedding planning, slower progress is being made with bar and bat mitzvahs. Teens are becoming ethically conscious, though, undertaking mitzvah projects and making donations to charities in honour of their guests. Some teens are twinning their celebration with a child who perished in the Holocaust, as a way to commemorate their lives. Volunteering at food banks or participation in out-of-the-cold programs are other popular projects. Such projects are often required as part of synagogue or school bar and bat mitzvah courses. Simchah baskets are widely used now as centrepieces. Filled with books, school supplies or food, the contents are later donated to organizations such as Zareinu or Tomchei Shabbes – both popular choices in Toronto.

Such projects help elevate the simchah, and it becomes more to the teen than just a party. "It's about what kind of person they want to become and what they can give back to the community," says Tamara Temes, a Toronto event planner. "It's putting the mitzvah back into bar and bat mitzvah."

But what about really "going green" at a bar or bat mitzvah? What if your child is a dedicated vegetarian or is committed to slowing global warming?

Temes suggests that if "your child is concerned about the environment, incorporate their passion into their special day." She offers ideas as simple as ensuring your venue is committed to recycling and composting, to centrepieces that are rented from an environmental charity, to group projects in which your teen can participate with their friends, such as planting trees or a community garden, or cleaning up a park. "For those truly committed to environmental awareness, their project might be to request that batteries, cellphones and other electronic waste is brought to the party and, after the weekend, take everything to a depot for proper disposal."

Such actions are about awareness and about having kids, parents and guests think outside their own world. You can help educate your guests by explaining the project on place-cards or programs for your event, or the greener option of having a simchah website, which explains why your child wanted to contribute to a particular cause.

As for greening the décor at a simchah, event planner Karen Garscadden's experience includes "flowering centrepieces meant to be replanted or totally edible centrepieces with fruit and chocolates." Clients are opting for rented props and away from live, cut florals, and seed-infused, plantable place-cards are quite popular.

"Parents want to set an example and are teaching children to have a social conscience. They are suggesting donations to a favourite charity instead of gifts, or encouraging children to donate a portion of their gift money to charitable causes," Garscadden says.

In wedding planning, couples are opting to register for gifts that match their values through unique registries, such as the Alternative Gift Registry (www.alternativegiftregistry.org).

Commandments of a good marriage

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

If I had my way, couples getting married would receive a how-to handbook, a little something they could read after all the wedding fuss has died down. Planning a wedding – choosing a gown, determining who sits where at the reception and opening gifts – these are the easiest parts of marriage. The more challenging parts come later, behind closed doors.

That's when you start to realize your spouse never replaces the toilet paper roll, takes a magazine into the toilet, is horribly flatulent in bed or has a habit of spending hour upon hour of supposed "couple time" hostage to the television, computer or iPad. The million-dollar question is: what are the commandments for a happy marriage? I asked couples with a decade or more of marriage under their belts what they thought. Here's what they came back with:

The sweet: find time for a six-second hug each day, ensuring there's no texting, e-mailing or phone calls occurring while it's taking place. Embrace for that length of time and you can connect with your spouse in a more meaningful way than by a quick peck on the cheek or affectionate squeeze before you rush out the door. In six seconds you can inhale their scent, feel the soft texture of their hair and get a body-to-body closeness that may just add a spring to your step all day long.

Keep dating: "Twice a week we go to a nice restaurant for good food and decent wine," jokes my friend Colin. "She goes on Mondays. I go on Tuesdays." Quips aside, couples that play together, stay together, a phrase that's particularly true once kids are born. Take time out to enjoy each other's company, whether it's dinner and a movie every couple of weeks or a day playing hooky from work so the two of you can just hang out. With time to simply be together doing something you both enjoy, it's easier to remember the partner you fell in love with when you said, "I do."

Learn the art of silence: this tip comes from a relative who was married some 50 years before she passed away. "I just learn to keep quiet sometimes," she told me when I asked for the secret to such a long, happy marriage. An art in itself, learning to shut up is a skill worth mastering in marriage, if only to keep the peace. The last word isn't always one worth having, and ending a dispute with an "I told you so" attitude doesn't do much for camaraderie or a sense of partnership.

Forget telepathy: you get to a point in a marriage where you just expect your spouse to know how you feel. Which is why many women feel it's not necessary to verbalize their feelings. But telepathy is overrated, and good communicating is one of the most essential commandments of a good marriage. Let your partner know what you want and don't expect them to read your mind. If they learn telepathy, it's an added bonus. But chances are, they'll need words to recognize what you need and when you want it.

Compromise: "Marriage is about give, take and compromise," says Tammy, a mother of three. "We'll never get our way all the time. But if both parties give and take a little, it's possible to meet somewhere in the middle and hopefully live a happy, healthy and full marriage."

Bad vibes? Fight it out if it needs to be fought. Every marriage involves disputes – it's how you resolve those disputes that makes or breaks your partnership. If there's something you need to discuss, get it out of your system, then kiss and make up. But don't use the word "always" when you complain about your spouse. Don't go to bed mad at each other. And don't let it linger unresolved for months on end. Communicate, resolve and move forward.

Pick your battles: in a marriage, there's lots of "small stuff" issues that may bug you but aren't worth a full-on argument. The toilet seat that got left up. Smelly socks under the bed. A kitchen that was kosher until he decided to make dinner. The key is not to sweat the small stuff. Save the arguments for issues that matter deeply and, remember, though your list of spousal irritations may be long, his is likely just as long.

Don't look for trouble: you always hear the same excuses when people have an affair. "It just happened," they will say.

"It was a once-off mistake."

"S/he caught me in a moment of weakness."

I don't buy it. People emit signals when they want others to know they are available, and those signals lead to glances, insinuations and conversations inappropriate for those of us who have tied the knot. Married couples owe it to each other to be faithful, and when that value slips, trust and loyalty are lost as well.

Forget the 50-50: there's no such thing as 50-50 in a good marriage, so drop the compulsion to compare what he did to what you did. There's no point keeping tabs on who made coffee last, who did the last carpool or who worked harder. Accept that each partner will do their share in the areas of their respective strengths, and that somehow, when two people pull together as one, the family unit will work and work well.

65 years together

Bertha Kronenberg
Special to The CJN

There is no magic about the numbers 6 and 5, and yet on celebrating our 65th anniversary, I cannot but reflect on how I met my husband, Gerhard, under an African sky.

He fascinated me with his European ways – so different from the locals. He was someone who appeared more refined and gentlemanly.

Our backgrounds were very different – he had fled Nazi Germany – his parents were killed in the Holocaust – to join his brother and was allowed to enter South Africa, ostensibly to work underground in the gold mines.

The former 10,000-metre German national champion chose to use his wits and worked at various jobs. He never told me that he was invited to represent Germany at the 1936 Olympics but refused their condition that he should renounce his religion. I was intrigued with this man because he never talked about himself or advertised his achievements.

He enlisted in the South African Defence Force, chose to be a dispatch rider, and went to Ethiopia, Somalia and Kenya. During this time, he contracted malaria – he lost a lot of his curly hair – and later suffered a spinal injury when he fell off his bike on one of the mostly rutted, rough roads.

I was born in South Africa – my family came from Lithuania. At the age of 16, I was self-supporting. I went to night school after work to improve my shorthand. I can still write in Pitmans. I got bored with my work, and joined the Air Force in the meteorology section. Here, we flew in an open "kite." Imagine the wind pulling the skin on your cheeks like rubber. It was wonderful cruising among the puffy cumulus clouds as they towered in the blue.

Bertha and Gerhard Kronenberg

By the time I met Gerhard, I was living with my sister. I had been brought up in an orphanage.

He lived with people on the other side of Johannesburg. He courted me, and he used to walk to visit me, carrying a long knife for protection. I told my sister that as we had no parents, she should ask him if he intended to marry me. Now there's a reverse proposal for you.

Our wedding was nothing fancy. We borrowed money from a friend, and I had a second-hand wedding gown, but I reckoned I was the bees' knees.

We have been blessed with three sons, their wives and four grandchildren. Two sons are still in South Africa, and our eldest, Bud, and his wife live in Scarborough. We feel great pride and joy that we are able to hug and kiss his family in person.

Our sons in South Africa are in touch daily by Skype, and I keep in close touch with my grandchildren on Facebook.

We've had our ups and downs, and healthwise we have overcome many hurdles. I studied by correspondence and earned my BA (majors English and psychology) and went further to study honours English.

We have lived in Toronto for 24 years – in the Bluffs in Scarborough for most of that time. To settle down, Gerhard invited the neighbours for snacks, informing them in a loud, clear voice that we had chosen to settle here, that we are from South Africa and that we are Jewish. The hospitality extended to us over those years has been phenomenal. My mezuzah fascinated Jewish salesmen.

We respect each other as individuals. We don't try to absorb each other.

Gerhard is a doer, and I am a thinker. He is a practical person, not given much to the arts. He still loves watching sports on television but only has peripheral vision because he has macular degeneration. His hearing is excellent, and he can sing, but I can't. I love to read. He is wise. He is now 97 and I am 87.

For two years, we have lived at Forest Hill Place, and we have met remarkable people here. If I want to take part in an activity, I go. Gerhard is very supportive. We had an unexpected anniversary party here, and all the residents helped us celebrate.

Birthday milestones through the years

Heidi Zackon
Special to The CJN

For one day each year, everyone gets to feel like the star of the show. While every year brings a reason to celebrate, the milestone years seem to pack more punch as people take stock and reflect on their lives.

"Looking back over the years, the big birthdays really stand out," says Joanne Berg, 46. "As a kid you remember turning 11, because now you are in the double digits. You remember 13 for the bar mitzvah parties, 16 for the chance to drive, 18 for finally becoming legal and 20 for the official end of your teenage youth."

Through the adult years, decades are counted, and each passing one brings different feelings and different ways of celebrating life's stages. "For me, 30 was still a lot of fun and easy to celebrate," Berg says. "Life was very busy and full, and my 30th birthday was a good excuse to take a little break and have a party with friends."

Berg admits to being a little less enthusiastic about a big celebration for her 40th birthday, but she still chose to get together for dinner with her closest friends.

"For my husband's 40th birthday, I planned a surprise dinner at a restaurant, and a few of his close friends came from out of town, so that made it extra special," she says. "Neither of us wanted a big splash at 40, but we did feel the significance of the age and found a way to honour it. Some of our friends did have bigger parties, and it was fun to celebrate with them in that way too."

With her husband's 50th birthday just around the corner, Berg feels a change at this age. "Our priorities have naturally shifted over time, and after so many years of working and raising a family, now it seems time for a little personal indulgence. We think about places we haven't been to, or things we would still like to experience, so I think a little vacation for the two of us might be just the right thing."

While turning 60 is another decade away for Berg, she did recently celebrate her aunt's 60th birthday and the two of them talked a lot about what entering the so-called "senior decade" felt like. "It's funny how a number can make you feel all sorts of things inside, but it really is true that you are as young as you feel," she says. "Since my aunt lives in a different city, we set ourselves up to see each other on our computers and we had a family party complete with cake and candles just the same. It turned out to be the perfect way to celebrate with her."

With many decades still to come, Berg hopes each one will bring its own meaningful celebration with family and friends. "Our days are so busy and time passes so quickly. It is nice to slow down the pace and just experience our lives at each stage along the way," she says. "Birthdays, especially the milestones, remind us to do just that."

A Simcha at Beth Sholom Synagogue

Booking at a synagogue has many advantages over a Banquet Hall. Centrally located, no valet parking fees, no corkage fees, ceremony and reception all in one location, superior kosher catering. Before you go anywhere else, consider Beth Sholom for your Simcha. Entrench yourself in the tradition of your grandparents and parents.

Caterers York $100 per person all inclusive package. Includes:
H'ors d'oeuvres • Appetizer • Main course • Dessert table • Linens • Bar • All taxes and gratuities.
Book your wedding or evening party at Beth Sholom for more than 150 guests before July 1, 2012 and we will waive all facilities charges. Just pay the caterer. A savings of up to $1900.
Some restrictions apply. Call the Synagogue Office for details.

"...Walking into the Sanctuary at the synagogue, and taking in the beautiful high ceilings, stained glass windows and bima I got teary eyed as I realized that we had found the right venue."

"...Bill Batista (from Caterers York) was a pleasure to work with. He was very accommodating and willing to help us find a menu that we were all comfortable with. After the wedding we got rave reviews about the food..."

Book keeps the lid on comfort food

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

The 52 delicious, nutritious recipes in Simply Soup are bound to bowl over everyone in the community from kids and bubbies to brides and grooms. Each recipe is enhanced with a stunning colour photograph so that the artfully designed presentations please the eye and pique the palate.

Proceeds from the hardcover, coilbound recipe book benefit Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors Foundation.

"I'm glad everyone likes our book, because our executive committee, along with recipe contributors and testers, volunteered so much time, effort and expertise into making this project a success," says Melissa Margles, the foundation's development co-ordinator.

Foundation president Mike Wagen and director Cathy Simons are equally delighted with the results and grateful that the team started off with soups, implying that they look forward to preparing a series with more courses to follow that will boost foundation funds.

Others besides the 21-member executive committee contributed to the eight-month gestation period. Like proud parents, they regard the project as their baby. The book costs $25 and copies are available at the Cummings Centre Boutique, 5700 Westbury Ave., online at www.cummingscentre.org or by phone at 514-343-3529, extension 7373.

Looking for a wedding gift? Committee members offered some suggestions to accompany the book. To make a dramatic presentation, add a beautiful soup tureen or a large, sturdy pot or food processor, or a hand blender or a ladle. Or include a set of soup bowls and spoons. For a bridal shower, Simply Soups is a useful present on its own.

Margles, along with four committee members, gathered at the Cummings Centre recently to discuss the book and the significance of soup as a versatile, wholesome, tasty, comfort food. Soups are easy to prepare and they inspire novices with confidence in cooking, so they're perfect for brides and grooms starting out, Arlene Sternthal observes.

"Each recipe was tested and retested. Our editing team checked for accurate, simple instructions. We have included helpful hints." For example, one tip found in the book, Sternthal says, is to cut a leek in half lengthwise and run it under cold water until dirt disappears.

Debi Budning Latsky assumed the daunting task of book design and layout. "I'm accustomed to design and printing, but it's the first time I've worked on a 144-page document," she said. "We made sure the printing is clear, consistent and the soups are arranged according to season."

Flipping through the colour-coded sections, she illustrates how the listing begins with summer soups and progresses to autumn, winter and spring offerings. "Our ingredients for each category reflect what's available that particular season."

Like her committee peers, Roz Weiner is an accomplished cook and likes to entertain. "I enjoyed working on the project and I learned a lot," she says. "Everyone brought in dinnerware, cutlery and unusual pieces. Our talented food stylists co-ordinated everything with photographer Joe Lapin." The presentation is awesome, and Weiner is sure readers will adopt unique ways to serve and showcase soups.

"Soup is so versatile and can be served as an entrée or starter or a main dish," Maxine Bloom said. "An example is our hearty recipe for Stone Soup, which is a complete meal in a bowl." It's a winter soup, chock full of carrots, celery, fresh spinach, shredded cabbage, rice, kidney beans, crushed tomatoes, vegetable stock and seasonings.

Bloom keeps her pantry stocked with labelled jars of homemade soup. "It's easy to make and worthwhile to have on hand."

Nothing goes to waste when it comes to scrumptious Squash & Pear Soup, a spring soup that makes use of the butternut squash itself as a container. For a cool summer treat, sweet enough to satisfy dessert lovers, the team presented a picturesque bowl of Cold Strawberry Soup.

Experienced cooks seeking new tantalizing soups for the next 12 months will discover recipes for curried, creamed, cold, piping hot and ethnic fusions that run the gamut from Moroccan Fava Bean, and Thai Coconut Ginger to Tuscan White Bean, to Polish Pickle, Tropical Gazpacho, French Onion, Easy Mexican Soup and a multitude of other delectables.

Contributors' names are not mentioned on any of the recipes because it's a group effort, Margles said. "We would receive similar recipes and try many variations and different ingredients until we came up with the best formula."

Student Erica Rowniak worked with the committee and produced a comprehensive ingredient conversion chart. In addition to all the extraordinary recipes, the team provided soup-making tips and tricks, a glossary of terms, a list of tools used in soup making, recipes for basic vegetable, beef and chicken stock.

Many synagogues going green

Vegetarians often complain that their needs aren't met at [illegible] but caterers insist they are willing to meet their clients' needs for special menus or diets. They want to offer more than just double servings of the salad or vegetable and are developing interesting and tasty vegetarian options.

Being eco-conscious also means being mindful of waste. In Toronto, kosher caterers may call a gemach – which is a group that picks up leftovers and distributes them to needy families. Ask your caterer to use this service.

Other green steps involve using a venue that is committed to recycling and composting. Many synagogues are now doing this, but it's worth asking if you are unsure. For less formal luncheons or breakfast events, why not forgo disposables and rent dishes instead? Or, purchase compostable plastics and paper goods. They are widely available in urban centres.

The make-your-own-pizza wedding shower

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

When I was a young teenager my granny told me: "Forty days before a daughter is born, her husband is selected in heaven."

I remember worrying: "I just hope God gets it right."

Years later, as the young mother of marriage-age daughters, I was still worrying. But the first time I saw Zach, I knew he was the one for my daughter Cindy. As for Frank and Alyssa, there was definitely divine intervention in that one. And Julie and Edward had such a long courtship that by the time they said "I do" and were both lifted up in chairs as everyone danced around them, they were smiling from ear to ear.

And so I had the pleasure of umpteen bridal showers of all sorts, sizes and shapes.

Lately, everyone seems conscious of creating new traditions, and I doubted any of the showers would be the expected all-women, sit-down luncheons where the bride opened her presents one by one, and everything she said would be dutifully recorded by her maid of honour, then read aloud. I also doubted anyone would assemble a bouquet of gift bows – how 20th century.

And so it began.

I hosted a couples' shower for Cindy where each loving duo was instructed to share the most romantic moment in their relationship; another where guests were asked to paint a picture and some words of wisdom on two giant kitchen aprons. At a shower for Alyssa, her new sisters-in-law created new food traditions and played the "telephone" game, where we started a tall tale that nobody quite knew how to finish.

At an intimate shower for Julie, guests constructed a large quilt of three different squares of fabric. Some embroidered, others drew pictures, still others created poetry and homilies and calligraphed them onto the fabric. A seamstress sewed the pieces together and produced a quilt for my daughter's new home.

We gushed over gatherings at an elegant country club, a beautiful back yard, and perhaps the most fun, a potluck celebration at the park.

The most delightful element of all these showers was that everyone was participating, so I thought, how about a shower where the couples learn to make their own pizza?

The bridal couple led off by making the first pizza, and then got to watch, kibbitz and tease each couple as they took a turn making the bread of our ancestors. Even though Neapolitan baker Raffaele Esposito is credited with having invented pizza pie in the 19th century, ancient Israelites baked flat, unleavened bread in rustic mud ovens, then covered it with their favourite topping, years earlier.

Men enjoy the activity as much as women and are often more creative pizza makers because they're not so worried about being perfect, says chef and food stylist Rori Trovato, who has held many a pizza-making party at her home in Santa Barbara, Calif.

Author of Dishing with Style, she calmed our nerves, assuring us that that the pizza pie of antiquity is very forgiving. And she hates predictably round pies.

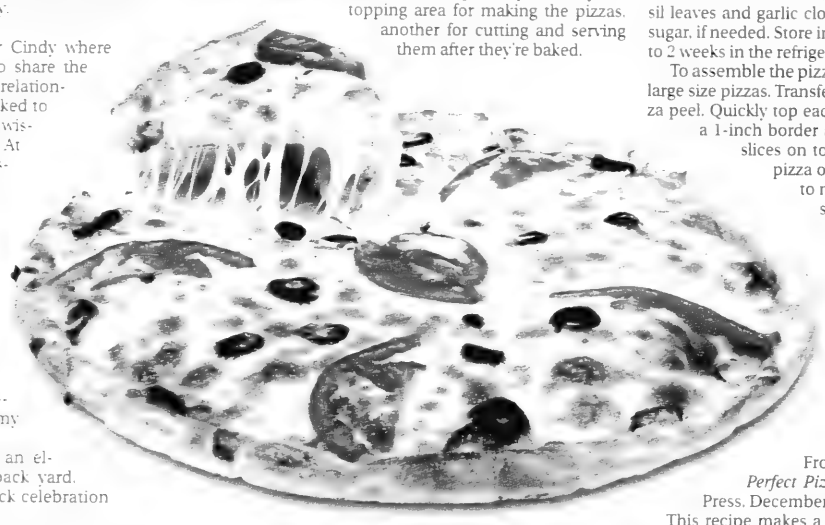
"When hosting a pizza party, organization is key," says Trovato, who recommends having all the ingredients prepared in advance and everything in its place before you begin cooking, the same as in a pizzeria.

To make it easier, Trovato recommends buying prepared pizza dough. If you'd rather make it from scratch, assemble it the day before the shower and divide it into balls big enough to make individual pizzas. Leaving it in the refrigerator overnight actually gives it more flavour. When you are ready to assemble the pizzas, remove only as many as you need.

Trovato proceeded to roll the dough, brush it with oil, then top it with sauce, and a variety of ingredients, then cautioned everyone to wear gloves when they took their masterpieces out of the oven. Freshly baked pizzas are hot!

Essential Tools: pizza stone, wooden baker's peel (a type of "shovel", a rimless baking tray or very wide spatula, long handled tong, roller-style pizza cutter or large sharp knife. Microplane zester or good cheese grater, a rolling pin. If making dough, you'll need an electric mixer with a dough hook or a food processor.

The Table: Set one large table or several smaller ones with a washable tablecloth, the necessary tools, cheeses and graters, bowls of sauces and toppings, and condiment oils in small jars with metal spouts so guests can assemble pizzas easily. Divide the tasks into stations – a dough making area to roll out, stretch and shape the pizzas, a pizza topping area for making the pizzas, another for cutting and serving them after they're baked.



Tips For Assembling Pizzas: The oven should be heated to 550 1-1/2 hours before making the pizzas. Assemble pizzas just before transferring them to the oven. Liberally flour the pizza peel. Keep pizzas loose on peel, making sure the end of it is clean so pizzas will slide off easily on to the pizza stone. Brush raw dough with olive oil, then the tomato or pesto sauce, then the myriad of toppings, all at room temperature. Don't overload the pizza, or when you slide it on to the stone the toppings may spill over and stick to the stone. Don't have any ingredients that are too watery or juicy, or pizza will end up soggy. Check pizza after 10 minutes; if it's not browned enough, bake 1 to 2 minutes longer until cheese is bubbling and colour is pleasing. Work quickly; pizza dough is impatient.

Topping Ideas: Thick tomato sauce; pesto sauce; a variety of cheeses – mozzarella, Parmigiano-Reggiano, gorgonzola or goat cheese; sautéed or caramelized onions and garlic; sautéed mushrooms including cremini and portabella; sautéed or roasted red, yellow, orange or green peppers; kalamata or oil-cured olives (pits removed); anchovies; roasted purple or yellow potatoes; sun-dried or oven-dried tomatoes; sautéed radicchio

CLASSIC MARGHERITA PIZZA

From Dishing with Style by Rori Trovato, Clarkson/Potter Publishers, 2004 prepared pizza dough

Tomato Sauce

3 garlic cloves, peeled
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
1 28-oz. can whole tomatoes in their juice
4 to 5 whole leaves of basil
1 tsp. kosher salt, plus more to taste
1 tsp. sugar, plus more to taste

Topping:

1 lb. fresh mozzarella cheese, sliced 1/4-in. thick
6 to 8 whole basil leaves
kalamata olives, for garnish

Preheat oven to 550 and make the sauce. In a large saucepan over medium-high heat, sauté garlic cloves in olive oil until golden brown, 4 to 6 minutes. Turn off the heat for 5 minutes to cool the oil. Add all the remaining sauce ingredients. Bring to a boil, reduce the heat to low, and simmer for 30 minutes. Remove and discard the basil leaves and garlic cloves. Adjust seasoning with salt or sugar, if needed. Store in a plastic or glass container for up to 2 weeks in the refrigerator.

To assemble the pizza, roll out dough into individual or large size pizzas. Transfer pizzas onto a lightly floured pizza peel. Quickly top each pizza with sauce, leaving about a 1-inch border around the edges. Lay mozzarella slices on top to cover and carefully slide the pizza onto the hot stone. Do not attempt to move pizzas on the stone; they will stick. Bake individual pizzas for 6 to 8 minutes and the large pizza for 10 to 12 minutes, until lightly browned and bubbly. Using long handled tongs, remove pizza from oven, sliding it onto peel, cutting board, or plate. Top with the basil, tearing the leaves as you place them. Place an olive in the centre of each pizza.

PESTO SAUCE

From American Pie: My Search for the Perfect Pizza by Peter Reinhart, Ten Speed Press, December 2003.

This recipe makes a smooth, creamy pesto. It can be baked on top of focaccia or pizza, or drizzled over it after it comes out of the oven. It will keep for about a week in the refrigerator, but will be at its best during the first 24 hours. You can substitute toasted walnuts for the pine nuts, or add them in equal parts.

2 cups fresh basil leaves
8 cloves garlic, minced
1 cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 cup pine nuts, lightly toasted
3/4 cup freshly grated Parmigiano-Reggiano or pecorino Romano cheese
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
salt to taste

In a blender or food processor, combine the basil, garlic, olive oil and lemon juice and puree until smooth. Add half the pine nuts and blend for a few seconds to grind them coarsely. Transfer the puree to a bowl and fold in the cheese, the remaining pine nuts, pepper and salt. Place in an airtight container and keep refrigerated until needed. Makes about 2 cups

Poignant story touches the world

Began 10 years ago with CJN interviews

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

George Brady is an unprepossessing man. The celebrity that came with publication of his family's wartime story came as a complete surprise to him.

His story was turned into a bestselling children's book, a film, a children's play and a radio documentary. He received invitations from around the world to speak, and piles of letters from elementary schoolchildren tell how they were inspired by the story of Hana's Suitcase.

The story of Hana's suitcase has acquired a momentum of its own, being shown in film festivals and growing now to include the brave new worlds of social media and the family's website (www.hanassuitcase.ca).

Ten years ago, when Brady visited the offices of The CJN, he told the remarkable story of his sister, Hana, who was murdered at age 13 in Auschwitz after living for two years in Theresienstadt. Their parents had already been killed and Brady felt as the older brother – all of 16 at the time – he had a responsibility to keep his little sister safe. After her death, he made it his mission to keep her memory alive.

A series of remarkable coincidences brought the story to more people than Brady could have imagined, beginning when Fumiko Ishioka, a Japanese educator, contacted him about a replica suitcase she'd received from the Auschwitz Museum. She'd asked for an artifact to help make the Holocaust more current and real to her students, and the museum had chosen a replica suitcase, the original of which had belonged to Brady's sister. Brady did not know it even existed.

"Do you think this is a story," he asked with characteristic modesty.

And how!

The story ran on the front page of The CJN and attracted the attention of Karen Levine. She authored Hana's Suitcase, a children's book that has been translated into more than 45 languages and as of 2009 was in its 24th printing.

Mirvish Appointed

GUELPH, Ont. — Theatre impresario David Mirvish has been named the next chancellor of the University of Guelph, the eighth in the school's 48-year history. He replaces Senator Pamela Wallin, the ex-broadcaster, who resigned the post in March 2011, citing workload, the Guelph Mercury reported. Mirvish, son of late businessman "Honest Ed" Mirvish owns four theatres in Toronto, as well as Honest Ed's department store. He's also a member of the Order of Canada.

Heritage Day Debate

TORONTO — Ontario MPPs are set to debate a bill this week that would designate May as Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario, honouring the achievements of Jewish Canadians in the province. The bill, co-sponsored by Thornhill Conservative MPP Peter Shurman and Parkdale-High Park NDP MP Cheri DiNovo, has the support of all parties in the legislature and is endorsed by a wide range of Jewish groups. May was chosen because it's a significant month for Jewish artistic and cultural events, and because Holocaust Remembrance Day and Israeli Independence Day also frequently occur in May.

WORLD

New Mashgichim

KRAKOW — Reacting to higher demand for kosher food, 17 Polish Jews graduated from a seminar certifying them as mashgichim, marking the first time since the Shoah Jews have been certified as kashrut supervisors in Poland. The graduates, mostly in their 20s and 30s, attended a three-day seminar in Krakow by the Jerusalem-based Shavei Israel organization, under the auspices of Polish Chief Rabbi Michael Shudrich. The demand for more locally made kosher food comes from a re-emerging Jewish community and rising Jewish tourism, Shavei Israel said.

Firebomber to finish sentence in jail

MONTREAL — Omar Bulphred, one of two men convicted in the 2006 firebombing of an Outremont yeshiva and the attempted firebombing of the Snowdon YM-YWHA in Montreal in 2007, has been refused early release.

Omar Bulphred

The Parole Board of Canada decided he must remain in prison for the remaining four months of his seven-year sentence because he has not reformed his behaviour since the punishment was handed down in February 2009.

The board decision believes Bulphred suffers from a mental health problem and is still capable of committing a violent crime. His sentence expires June 11.

Bulphred and his accomplice, Azim Ibragimov, were charged with hate crimes after they threw a Molotov cocktail into the entrance of the chassidic Skver community's boys' school Toldos Yakov Yosef in September 2006 and tried to ignite a propane-fuelled explosive outside the Y in April 2007.

Bulphred, now 26, also pleaded guilty to uttering threats, namely writing a letter in which he and Ibragimov spoke of jihad and demanded the release of a group of men, linked to an Islamist cell, who were arrested on terrorism charges in Toronto in 2006. He was released to a halfway house last May, but was soon sent back to jail when he threatened another resident with a knife.

Deputy Settles Case

LOS ANGELES — The Jewish sheriff's deputy who arrested actor Mel Gibson and was the subject of his antisemitic rant in 2006 settled a religious discrimination case against his department. James Mee says he was subject to religious discrimination and a hostile work environment after the arrest. Mee claims his supervisors ordered him to remove Gibson's antisemitic remarks from the official incident report, placing them instead in a confidential supplemental report. He claims he was passed over for promotions in the department because he complained about it.

Regina student union backs BDS motion

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A resolution by a pro-Palestinian student group that requires the University of Regina Students' Union (URSU) to endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel passed at URSU's annual general meeting earlier this month.

The Regina Solidarity Group, a chapter of Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), released a statement following the Feb. 8 gathering that boasted about the victory being "a huge first step towards the full divestment of the University of Regina from companies complicit with the human rights violations currently taking place in Palestine."

Part of the motion demanded that URSU "commit to identifying and divesting from companies that support or profit from Israeli war crimes, occupation and oppression."

The statement said SAIA members plan to work with URSU to "begin investigating URSU's portfolio for companies that support or profit from Israeli war crimes, as well as collectively launching an education campaign on campus about the issue."

URSU president Kent Peterson told The CJN that about 150 students came to the AGM, which is open to the university's 12,000 undergraduate and graduate students, and voted on various motions. He said that when the BDS motion was brought forward, students were given the opportunity to debate it.

"There were actually no con speakers to the motion. There were a few pro speakers, and then it was voted upon," he said. "I believe it was passed unanimously and if it wasn't unanimous, there might have been one vote against it."

Emile Scheffel, vice-president external of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), said that the BDS campaign is anti-dialogue, anti-peace, and singles out Israel for condemnation.

"These are some of the reasons the BDS campaign, despite all its sound and fury, has achieved nothing," Scheffel said in a statement, one of many released by Jewish groups in the days following URSU's adoption of the motion.

"Sadly, this resolution singles out and punishes Israelis, holding the lone democracy in the Middle East entirely responsible for the conflict. The condemnation of Israel, and Israel alone, is particularly bizarre, given the upheaval and loss of life occurring at the hands of repressive regimes across the region," Scheffel said.

Emile Scheffel

"We hope URSU members will withdraw their support from this failed, discredited effort that only promotes division and resentment."

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, echoed Scheffel's call to repeal the motion.

"The campaign to boycott Israel rejects constructive dialogue and solutions that promote peace and reconciliation," Koschitsky said.

Trent University professor Asaf Zohar, national chair of Canadian Academics for Peace in the Middle East, said that "URSU's decision to boycott Israel, including Israeli universities and academics… [is] antithetical to the tenets of free expression and free association that are fundamental to academia… [and] is blatantly discriminatory."

Silence of the hypocrites

From the editor's desk...

Last Monday morning at the United Nations General Assembly, the UN's high commissioner for human rights, Navi Pillay, accused Syrian President Bashar Assad of committing "crimes against humanity."

As reported in Ha'aretz, Pillay said the continued crackdown on pro-democracy activists was ordered with the complicity of government authorities "at the highest level." She told the world that her organization intends to have Assad tried in the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

According to Pillay, as of December, more than 5,400 Syrians had been killed, more than 10,000 people injured and more than 18,000 people arrested and detained by the authorities.

Updated reports suggest more than 7,200 people have now been killed.

Each day for the past 11 months, since last March, when the uprising against him began, Assad and his army have brutalized the people of Syria to ensure his family and his clan's rule over the country.
